Again Heinz tomato-magic brings you brighter, heartier, more nourishing meals

At the peak of perfection Heinz Aristocrat tomatoes are picked, cooked and bottled within a matter of hours, capturing in sunny September the red-ripe goodness you will be able to enjoy all the year round.

Heinz Tomato Juice as a cocktail, Heinz Cream of Tomato Soup as a warming first course, and Heinz Tomato Ketchup and Chili Sauce to enliven the flavour of main dishes—these four, of the famous 57 Varieties, enjoy top popularity, for two reasons—first, because Heinz chefs are especially expert with tomatoes, and second, because only a pedigreed crop is good enough for Heinz. That's why we say "Tomato Time is Heinz Time."

When shopping for Ketchup compare Heinz big 13-oz. bottle with other brands. Ounce for ounce you'll find how little it costs to buy this big flavour bargain.

The Thorpe Affair

By Phillip Lesly

Terry showed his presscard to the desk clerk. "How many people called to see Mr. Thorpe today?"

The clerk answered immediately. "Only one, sir. A Mr. Stanton; he was in about 1 o'clock this afternoon. He left about half an hour later. He often called on Mr. Thorpe, sir."

"Thanks," Terry said. "If you ever get caught for speeding and want to keep it out of the papers, let me know."

Crossing the lobby, he slipped into a telephone booth and called the Sun. "Reference room" he told the operator.

"Hello, Poley? Terry. Say, get the clips on a guy named Stanton, will you? I think his first name is Russell."

In a minute he was listening eagerly while Poley gave him the gist of each of the clippings on Stanton that was in the files.

"He was elected secretary of the Norton Society . . . that was in June, 1919. Divorced by his wife in 1926 . . . There's a whole bunch of 'em. He was arrested for murder in 1927. A young fellow about 23 was found shot near Stanton's apartment. He got off on a habeas corpus writ . . . Had a smart lawyer, I guess . . . yeah, it was Henry Thorpe . . . "

"Who?"

"Henry Thorpe. He used to be a mouthpiece. That was before he got into the county's hire . . or vice versa.

Terry whistled softly. It was news to him that Thorpe had ever practiced law, but it was the relationship between the victim and Stanton that interested him. Murder, punishable by a death sentence, and an attorney who gives his client freedom. An interesting situation, and now, 10 years later, another interesting situation also involving murder and the same two men.

"Okay, Poley," he said. "Anything else of interest?"

"Yeah. Here's something from last month in Grimm's column. It says rumour has it that Stanton is in financial difficulty. Having trouble paying his bills.

Again Terry was interested. "All right, thanks. Give me the desk, will you?"

In a few minutes he had given the rewrite man the information he had garnered on Thorpe's death and was going back to his car. It was 4.30. There were a few things he had to know in order to go on trying to solve this problem; things that a certain auburn-haired girl could tell him. He again retraced his route, going north.

The desk of the Elm Street Apartment Hotel was in the charge of a young man, immaculately dressed and flawlessly polite, who said, "No sir," to Terry's question, "Did a pretty auburn-haired girl check out today?"

Terry described the object of his search. "Does she live here?"

The clerk said: "I can't say that it sounds familiar, sir. There are 117 apartments in this hotel and, if I must say it, there are many pretty women among our guests. And I'm not certain that any of our guests would condone our dispensing of information about them to the press without their previous consent."

"Oh," Terry said thickly, "So you won't talk?" But he knew that to press his point would be useless The clerk was right, of course; it wouldn't be quite right to disclose a guest's affairs without permission.

It seemed to him impossible that anyone who was so capable of attracting male eyes could avoid attracting attention merely by her presence. Yet at each store, at each news-stand, at each police corner he got the same answer: no one of that description was known. He suspected that there was considerable chivalry involved in the giving of these unhelpful replies, and realized that it was the same sense of chivalry, for a beautiful girl, that was spurring him on in his search but just now all this desire to protect a woman with a pretty face was a nuisance.

Two hours passed during which each question he asked received practically the same answer; which meant that he did not get the answer to the problem that was besetting him. It was with a feeling of disgust that he decided he was on the wrong track and called it quits.

He shrugged and started his car. At the first corner he bought a copy of the Sun.

It was not his story that graced the streamer line, but one that had come from the detective bureau:

"MYSTERY GIRL SOUGHT IN THORPE KILLING."

"Police Predict Quick Seizure; State's Attorney Promises Full Penalty for Murder." Then the story:

"Three hours after the discovery today of the body of Henry Thorpe powerful politician, in his room at the Midtown Hotel, police were seeking a mysterious auburn-haired girl who was seen running on the same floor as Thorpe's apartment. James Crowell, janitor, told detectives that he saw a girl race through the hall and run down the back stairs. he desoribed her as 'dark-red-haired and pretty as a picture. And her figure was swell, too.' He further said she was about 5 feet, 3 inches tall and was dressed in a brown sport suit.

"The murder of Thorpe, clouded in mystery, shocked county and city officials who were associated with the victim in political matters . . ."
