That Body Of Yours

RELATION BETWEEN IMPAIRED HEARING AND APPARENT FEEBLEMINDEDNESS

I have written before about the boy who was considered slow at school until it was found that his eyesight and hearing were defective.

At the dish-washing period, obligated only when last clean ones have been used, "Yes," he remembers of this, time still stamped indelibly on his mind.

In Nervous Children, Dr. William G. Hardy (Johns Hopkins Hospital) discusses the relation between impaired or poor hearing and pseudo (false) feeble-mindedness.

Where there is impaired hearing before the child starts to school, this "constitutes a serious interference with development of normal language habits."

Where there is impaired hearing after the child starts to school, this "constitutes a serious interference with development of normal language habits."

ELLEN'S DIARY

By An Island Farmer's Wife

October, month of falling leaves and squirrels' harvest, eased away today in sun and shower and a coolness in the air which made granddaughter speaking of it suggest: "It must be that we've moved nearer now to the North Pole."

It comes to mind now with an accompanying smile that this receipt of the closing load of our harvest is not effected as easily as it is written.

"Women," James scoffed rather unflatteringly on a recent morning when we remarked "it appears that you are missing your weaker help today" since their cares had bound them indoors for an interval.

At the dish-washing period, obligated only when last clean ones have been used, "Yes," he remembers of this, time still stamped indelibly on his mind.

And so we shall be there to receive the last load of the harvest of the fields with James, to share the joy of it, to join him in the peace and blessing which attends this rite.

DOROTHY DIX SAYS—

Perpetual Affection

Is Love Real "Which Alters When It Alteration Finds?"

DEAR DOROTHY DIX: Our English class has been given the following quotation to comment upon. It is taken from Shakespeare's Sonnet No. 116: "Love is not love which alters when it alteration finds."

ANSWER: Quite the contrary of Mr. Shakespeare's, for I think that love is bound to change if its object changes, and that one would have to be blind, deaf and dumb and a moron to go on loving someone who had become unlovable.

SOME MARRIAGES DEMONSTRATE

This artless belief that the heart is a perpetual-motion machine that once set going can't be stopped finds its fullest illustration in marriage and explains why husbands and wives take so little trouble to make themselves attractive to each other.

DEAR DOROTHY DIX: I married an ideal man, or so it seemed to me. Two children came. My husband fell ill. For years he was a semi-invalid. I nursed him, waited on him, wore myself to a frazzle trying to help him for ten years.

ANSWER: Nothing could be more tragic or more pitiful than your experience. Nothing else so devastates the soul as to find out that one has sacrificed one's life to an ingrate, nothing such a blighting disappointment as to find out that those one has loved and trusted have betrayed one.

DEAR MISS DIX: I have a very attractive sister who is now a widow. She has never seemed interested in men until now when she has fallen head over heels in love with a man who has no job, no money, no home.

ANSWER: Nothing. When a woman is so much infatuated with a man she is deaf to reason and there is no use in arguing with her. It is a pity she can't be locked up until she comes to her senses.

DOROTHY DIX cannot reply personally to readers, but will answer problems of general interest through her column.
