CRESCENT CARNIVAL

FRANCES PARKISON KEYES

It was hard for Patty, after that, to open the door of the drawing room where her mother and her Aunt Lula and Mrs. Fay were sitting, and to say that she was bringing in Drew Breckenridge, who had come to call.

Her hand was already on the knob of the drawing room door when he checked her, putting his fingers lightly on her wrist and bending over to look at it in somewhat the same searching way that he had looked into her eyes, but less gravely. "That's a pretty bracelet you've got on, Patty. Mind telling me where you got it?"

"Not at all. A masker at the Pacific Ball gave it to me."

"Oh, I see. Are you wearing it all the time?"

"Yes. I like it very much. It was the first present I ever had from a man. You don't mind having me wear it, do you?"

"I'm delighted to have you wear it," he said. "I've always thought a bracelet was perfect for a first present. It prepares the hand for a ring."

It was not until he had gone, hours later, that Patty remembered her bracelet was a counterfeit of the one she had seen Evelyn Baird hiding and realized that, since Drew Breckenridge and the mysterious masker were identical, it was Drew who had given Evelyn her bracelet, too.

The unpredictable Orkney weather had turned warm overnight, and Louis alertly answering Drew's morning ring, suggested that his master might like to breakfast on the upper gallery. The suggestion seemed an excellent one to Drew, though he never sat there without remembering how his father had yearned to use it and how his mother had suppressed the desire. Presently Louis reappeared on the upper gallery, carrying a note on a silver salver. "This just came for you, Mr. Drew," he said respectfully. "And Mrs. Baird just foamed. I told her you wasn't up, and she said she'd call you back in about an hour, 'less you was to call her before then."

Drew, deep in his letter, paid no attention to Louis' departure. The pleased smile continued to play around his lips while he read.

Dear Drew:

I am not quite sure whether you intended to come to see me today or not. So this is just a little note to tell you that I should be especially glad to have you, if you could spare the time, because I should like to talk to you seriously about something very important as soon as it would be convenient for you to have me. Tea time is the best hour from my standpoint because Mother is going to tea with Aunt Lula today, and the boys don't get home until after six. You see I rather wanted this talk to be confidential.

Affectionately yours,

Patricia Anne Forrestal

P.S.—I did have a lovely time with you yesterday.

Drew went into his study, addressed an envelope, took a sheet of paper from a brass rack, and wrote rapidly.

Dearest Patty:
Thank you for your delightful note. Of course I meant to come to see you today. I shall be at your house around three unless I hear from you within the next hour that this would be too early. I am looking forward with great eagerness to our confidential talk.

Devotedly yours,
Drew
P.S.—I had a lovely time with you yesterday, too. In fact, the best time I ever had in my life. But I believe there are lots of better times ahead of us.

It was evident to Drew that his reception had been carefully planned and his coming eagerly awaited. "I've been watching for you," Patty said joyously. "I'll always try to wait for you, so that you won't ever have to wait again — oh, Drew! It was sweet of you to send me those lovely flowers! Come quickly and see them!"

She seized his outstretched hands and drew him into the study, where he caught a glimpse of the roses rising amidst their glossy leaves from a crystal beaker that stood on a battered desk. Then, unexpectedly, Patty threw her arms around his neck and kissed him spontaneously, like a child. "I don't know how else to thank you," she said. "You said we were cousins. But perhaps we're not kissing cousins — perhaps there would have been a better way."

"There couldn't be any better way," Drew said gravely. He framed her face with his hands and looked steadily into her eyes. "We're not kissing cousins," he said slowly, stressing the last word. "But, of course, we're going to kiss each other. Now that you've kissed me, though, you must let me kiss you, too, the way I do want to."

Momentarily he waited, giving her a chance to slip away from him if she was startled or shocked.

ed. But she did not stir, and he bent his head until his lips touched her brow, slowly moving his hands from her face until they first slid over her shoulder and then rested lightly on her waist before they encircled it. Still she did not stir, and his lips, like his hands, moved slowly downwards, touching her eyelids and her cheeks and, last of all, seeking her mouth. Briefly, he felt her catch her breath, not as if in fear, but as if in unexpected rapture. (To be continued)

How Good Can Coffee Taste?

"From Contented Cows"

WHAT YOU SHOULD KNOW ABOUT CARNATION
CARNATION IS milk, made double-rich by evaporation. It is heavy enough to whip. And it is homogenized and heat-refined, so the last drop in the can is as creamy as the first.

USE IT LIKE CREAM in coffee or tea ... on cereals, fruits and desserts ... in recipes that call for cream.
FOR EVERY MILK PURPOSE mix half Carnation, half water, to get fine pasteurized, whole milk — but extra smooth and extra rich in vitamin D. Get Carnation next time you shop.
