Schools Literature Teaching Leave Poet Sharply Critical

TORONTO (CP)—Poet Irving Layton says the literature taught in schools today gives students a life-long hatred of it. "The teaching of literature is remote, just as the whole school system is remote, from society," he said in an interview. Mr. Layton, 3, poet-in-residence at Sir George Williams University in Montreal, said Thackeray and Hardy were excellent novelists but don't arouse the admiration of modern students. "The students learn to associate literature with the genteel, the la-de-da, the stilted."

Derailment Is Blamed On Vandalism

BOSTON (AP) — Sixty-two passengers were injured Monday in the derailment of a two-car commuter train that was shunted onto a siding by a tampered with switch.

The two most seriously injured were identified as Adam DeBono, 47, of Needham, Mass., and Hazel McPhee, 59, of Roslindale.

The New Haven Railroad said in a statement that investigators "have found evidence which points to vandalism on a siding switch." The statement added that the FBI had joined local authorities in an investigation.

Railway officials said a lock on the switch was broken and the switch thrown to divert the two self-propelled diesel cars to a curved, spur track. There were "about 90" commuters aboard.

Officials said the derailment occurred shortly after 7 a.m. The train had left nearby Needham at 6:51 and was due at south station in Boston at 7:27. The train was estimated to be travelling at 35 miles an hour when it passed the switch.

Soviet Leaders Build Wall Against Easing Discipline

By WILLIAM L. RYAN Soviet leaders have begun building a defensive wall to protect the Communist party's authority from influences and pressures by those who seek a more relaxed society.

A disciplinary crackdown may be in the making, a general tightening of the reins recalling some aspects of the Stalin era. A liberalizing tendency that began 10 years ago with Nikita Khrushchev's destruction of the Stalin legend is regarded in some circles as a threat to the party's future pre-eminence.

The party's 23rd congress adopted a new set of rules to keep out those who might balk at too much regimentation. Many such persons entered the party's swelling ranks in the Khrushchev years.

Khrushchev encouraged the young and the intellectual to join, apparently seeking their support to give the party a more powerful appeal to the new generation.

MANY NOT CHANGED Many joined without necessarily believing all its dogma. New rules appear aimed at stopping this process of dilution.

From now on, no Communist can recommend another person for membership without having himself been a member for five years. The previous requirement was three years. Nobody may join the party without first having been a member of the Komsomols, the young Communist league, which originally was designed as a training ground for the party.

A congress statement said the party intends to "get rid of persons violating the program and rules (of the party) and discrediting by their conduct the lofty title of Communist." The aim of the new rules, it said, is to "improve the qualitative composition of party members and raise the responsibility of party organizations for admission of new members to the party."

ADHERENCE DEMANDED In addition, remarks dropped in congress speeches must have had an ominous sound for writers and other intellectuals, foreshadowing demands for adherence to Stalin's "socialist realism," in which all art serves party and state exclusively.

The congress presented a picture of a leadership worried not only about internal strains and pressures, but also walking a foreign-policy tightrope.

Leonid Brezhnev, the party chief who now is called general secretary in an echo of the Stalin days, called for world Communist unity and a new world Communist conference "when the time is ripe." But it seems likely the Soviet leaders expect little from China by way of reconciliation. The congress resolutions will serve only to enrage Peking all the more.

The Kremlin seems to want to move with caution in its relations with the United States.

It seems to want to avoid becoming too deeply involved in situations that could provoke a Soviet-American clash. Such a clash has appeared to be a major aim of Chinese policy.

A final congress resolution said Moscow is convinced it is possible to avoid a new world war and it continues to favor "normal relations with all countries and settlement of international issues by negotiation."
