REVELATIONS Chapter 61

George began, "Gloria says you have the inferiority complex, and I must help you get rid of it."

Pan laughed. "What's that?" she asked. "It's a highbrow way of saying that you aren't conceited enough, that you under-rate yourself."

"I know, Gloria tells me that too. But I don't see what you are going to do about it. If I'm stupid enough not to be able—"

"Stop—that won't do. That thinking your stupid—is just why you never will amount to anything. Besides it's not true."

Pan began to defend herself, or rather to defend her old ingrained point of view.

"But it is true. Look at the way Gloria talks. She knows about everything it seems. She talks about pictures like an artist, she seems to have seen all the good ones; she talks about music like a musician, she's familiar with every thing that's played. I can't tell Stravinsky from Beethoven without a program and never heard of the "modern movement" in music until Gloria told me of it."

Pan made a little gesture to silence an interruption.

"And books! At least I thought I'd read. But I've read only the old standard sort of things, which if you have read and forgotten. There's a modern movement in literature that I know nothing of and writers of goods things in the past that I never dreamed about."

"Gloria knows every character in history—or almost everyone it seems to me. She knows about old books, and old china, and old furniture and medieval architecture—you all do. Don't you see why I feel so tongue tied and out of it?"

"You never had a chance to know these things—and Gloria's chances for learning them were exceptional," George answered.

"No, only that—she and all her friends know everything going on every day. They know why the Republicans are going to win at the next election, or whether they're going to lose, they talk about events in Washington with an intimacy that astounds me—I read the papers carefully and try to remember which Congressman comes from what state and whether he's Democrat—Gloria knows exactly how he'll vote on the next treaty—"

"Hold on a minute!—George cried, leaning back and laughing heartily. "If Gloria and her circle knew all that,—well they'd make their fortunes in other ways than by being interior decorators and artists."

"But—" Pan insisted. "I don't know enough about the present trend of events, who is who and what has been happening to talk of it at all."

"That's just it, you don't—but you're learning fast," George said. "Look here child, I want you to get out of your present state of mind. These things you envy may be desirable, but they are not essential. There isn't a woman in Gloria's circle who doesn't envy you with a positively bitter envy."

"Why?" the girl (lung the word at him almost like a challenge. "Because you have something they never can have."

"What?" she was simply wondering now. "Youth—simplicity—innocence—sense as well. And besides that, an eagerness to learn that they know will get you all the cleverness they build their own reputations upon."

Pan began to laugh. "I do feel like a new person since I came to live with Gloria," she said more quietly. "A few months ago in the country, I couldn't have talked like this. I couldn't even have thought like this. I would have been so scared of you that I could not have opened my lips."

George helped himself to another cigarette. "Gloria wanted me to tell you what I've said about you to her," he said. "I didn't believe in you at first. I didn't really believe that the combination of simplicity and innocence and sweetness that made up you, could exist in one person. I've known women who seemed to be all you are—but it was a sham, a pose, to attract men. Gloria is the other sort she's sweet and good underneath, as any woman could be, but she has a hardness that comes out now and then and an impulsiveness that annoys me—yet that makes her doubly attractive even when she's exasperating."

"I know," said Pan, thinking of Gloria's foolish disobedience to the doctor's orders and the great charm which she exerted to get her own way. "The proof of your sweetness and generosity," George went on, "was the way you came here this evening—a woman less sweet and generous would not have troubled merely because I chose to be cross and go without supper; a woman more sophisticated, more worldly, would have stopped because it's considered unconventional."

"But why? You were ill. You needed someone to look after you. You needed some supper anyway," insisted Pan.

George laughed. He picked up the telephone and called Gloria's number.

"It's getting late and I must send you back," he said.

Tomorrow—Growing Love

George began, "Gloria says you have the inferiority complex, and I must help you get rid of it."
