SIR MACKENZIE BOWELL.

Interesting Historical and Political Sketch of His Career.

When Sir John Thompson died, His Excellency the Governor-General placed the reins of administration in the hands of a widely known and familiar figure in the political history of Canada; and the fact is worthy of special mention that this choice met with general commendation. Popular expectation was completely satisfied when Sir Mackenzie Bowell was called to the Premiership. He had been a Minister of the Crown without interruption since the formation of the Cabinet of 1878, when the late Sir John Macdonald was returned to power after an unprecedented victory at the polls. His long experience in the administration of public affairs, his unflinching sense of duty, his modesty, his unobtrusive sagacity, his absence of waste or extravagance, his unwavering patriotism, and, above all, his incorruptible integrity, were widely recognized. In more ways than one he had shown himself a statesman who clearly grasped the means which could best promote the progress and destiny of his country. Moreover his allegiance to the principles of responsible government was unshakable. There and other qualities were generally held to fit him above many other men in public life for the trust which His Excellency asked him to assume.

Sir Mackenzie Bowell began life as a poor boy, and his rise to the exalted position which he now occupies, has many helpful and encouraging lessons to the young men of Canada who have nothing but their hands and brains with which to make their way in the world. He is in every sense of the term a "self-made man." He was but 10 years of age, when, in 1833, he came with his parents from England to the county of Hastings, in Ontario. He was born at Rickington, and spent his early boyhood at Walsham Lake, in Suffolk, where he had received no more than an elementary education. His father was a builder by trade, but followed the occupation of a farmer most of his life after he came to Canada, and was never able to rise beyond the position which he held when they had passed from beneath the parental roof and were in a fair way to earning their own livelihood. Sir Mackenzie's parents, however, endowed him with a keen intellect, and a more valuable inheritance of a high principle, a clear head and a strong body, and to the good and prudent use of this inheritance fortune has since all that he has to-day. At twelve years of age he was apprenticed to Mr. Geo. Benjamin as a printer, and it is perfectly characteristic of the man that in the office of the Belleville Intelligencer in which he started as "devil," he became to be the editor and proprietor.

At this period in the history of our country, every constituency in Upper Canada was in a state of wild agitation over the question of separating the schools and the incorporation by parliament of religious institutions. This crusade was led by the late Hon. George Brown, with the powerful influence of the Globe at his back. In every school in the province the children were to be taught the Separate School Act, and no more Loretto bills, referring to an Act passed by the Parliament of Upper and Lower Canada, incorporating the Ladies' Loreto school, in the fight Sir Mackenzie Bowell was asked to join, but he persistently refused, on the ground, as he then informed the electors, that no country could be governed on such principles. He pointed out that separate schools had been conceded, that properties and vested rights had been acquired under the law, and that he did not understand the principles of the Conservative party for the extinction of vested rights secured by law, and, therefore, whether elected or defeated, he would not be a party to any such policy. While he would vote against further concessions to the religious sects, he declared that he could not assist in depriving any class of Her Majesty's subjects of the rights which they then enjoyed. As to the incorporation of religious bodies, he pointed out that at the same session of Parliament in which an Act incorporating the Ladies' Loreto School was passed, the Episcopal Methodist Church of Upper Canada had secured an Act incorporating the Methodist Episcopal Seminary (now Albert College) at Belleville, in which greater powers and privileges had been conceded than were given in the Act incorporating the Ladies' Loreto. How was it possible, he asked, to govern a country like Canada upon such principles, remembering, as they should, the rights and privileges which had been guaranteed by Great Britain to the French and Roman Catholics under the treaty of Paris, when Canada was ceded to the British, and added that he would prefer defeat to pledging himself to such a policy. The electors took him to his word, and he was defeated by a large majority. This defeat, he told the electors, was the result of a spasmodic agitation, the unreasonableness of which they would realize before called upon to record their votes at another election, which prediction proved to be true, for when he presented himself again before the electors of North Hastings, in 1847, he was elected by a much larger majority than that by which he had been defeated four years before. This incident in Sir Mackenzie's life is referred to for the purpose of showing that the very legions of his political career he had learned the important fact that to govern a country successfully statesmen must know neither creed nor nationality. His capacity for leadership and his fitness for the discharge of public trusts seem to have been early recognized, for he was yet a young man when his fellow-citizens asked him to take a place in the school government of Belleville. He was for many years afterwards chairman of the Board of Education. He was a man, in fact, of public spirit. An earnest and aggressive debater, a thorough scholar, a prudent man, gifted with a robust common sense, which he brought to bear on every subject that came within his grasp—it is not surprising that he had the confidence of his fellow-citizens, and came to be a chief executive officer in local affairs. It would be tedious and uninteresting for the immediate purposes of this sketch to follow closely incidents and circumstances which led to his first step into the wider sphere of national politics. His transition was gradual, natural and healthy. He won his spurs in humble capacities before aspiring higher. It was in 1863, however, that he first, at the earnest request of a party convention, became a candidate for a seat in the Legislative Assembly of old Canada, and there is some instruction to be had from the fact that he was defeated.

He entered Parliament, therefore, at Confederation, and quickly became identified with the active work of the House. He was essentially a worker, but not an uncompromising partisan—although, in the language of the lobby, "a hard hitter." Six years later the Government of Sir John Macdonald was swept out of power, and the cold days of Conservative opposition began. During that period he took a very active part in the reorganization of the volunteer militia force of Canada. It is on record that his objections to the details of the Government measure were three times
