Criminal Negligence Trial Begins At Georgetown

The trial of Roderick Jeremiah Steele, Cardigan, charged with criminal negligence in the death of Leo Douglas Sheppard, also of Cardigan, began at Georgetown yesterday, the second day of the November sittings of the Supreme Court being presided over by Mr. Justice Mark McGuigan. Present for the prosecution were Premier and Attorney-General A.W. Matherson and J.P. Nicholson. Representing the accused were James Johnston and Somerset Trainor.

The jury was taken to the scene to view the area as he contended they were unable to get a picture of the scene from the photos and sketch. Mr. Justice McGuigan also refused this application.

The witness, questioned, stated that there was one track going into the washout and something else which might resemble a track. He pointed out that from the hill leading down to the washout, one would be unable to see the washout. He also said that the depth of the ditch at the point of the culvert was over ten feet. He also stated that the distance from the washout to the truck was 125 feet, and that it was approximately 1/2 mile from the top of the hill to the washout.

Dr. Lemuel Prowse, physician, Charlottetown, stated that he conducted a post mortem examination on the body and said that in his opinion death was due to marked internal hemorrhage and shock.

DAY OF ACCIDENT

Carl Cronin, Cardigan, farmer, stated that he saw Steele at the Sullivan forge at Cardigan about 10:30 on the morning of Monday, 28. He and Steele went to Cardigan where Steele got a half case of beer. They returned to the forge where each drank about three cans of beer. Later Steele left and the witness saw him no more that day.

William Walsh, Cardigan, farmer, said that he saw Mr. Steele at the Sullivan forge at Cardigan about 10:30 on the morning of Monday, 28. He and Steele went to Cardigan where Steele got a half case of beer. They returned to the forge where each drank about three cans of beer. Later Steele left and the witness saw him no more that day.

WAS WITH STEELE

Charles McLellan, Cardigan, farmer, stated that he had seen Steele at the forge at 11 a.m. and that the two of them had gone to Cardigan where Steele had purchased a bottle of wine. They went down to the shore, he said, where they drank the wine. Around noon he came home but about 2 p.m. he saw Steele again when he (Steele) was with Carl Cronin. At this point the evidence of the witness corroborated the evidence of the previous witness. He said that on the way to the dance he could see the road all right but that it was foggy in the low places. They picked up Campbell at his gate, he said, and after going a short distance, the truck went into the ditch and rolled over. He said that they met no other cars or trucks on the road. They were driving in the centre of the road, he thought, and he did not remember bushes brushing the side of the truck. He said he had taken part in drinking three bottles of wine that day.

On cross examination by Mr. Johnston, the witness said that the arrows and marks made on the photos were made from memory and also said that the photo showed the exact spot of the washout on the road. Explained that the road had a gradual curve, and was slightly wider to the east of the washout than to the west. The washout, he said, was almost directly over the culvert and extended about 18 inches towards the centre of the road from the ditch.

and after they had rolled back the truck he saw young Sheppard lying on the ground. He said he went to the home of George MacPhee to get him to take young Sheppard to Cardigan.

On cross examination he said that it was about a quarter-mile from where they picked up Mr. Campbell to the washout. He said that the truck struck a hole in the road, went into the ditch and rolled over. He repeated that someone shouted to Steele to pull the truck out and that he did try to do so. He said that he saw MacPhee's truck going into the same washout, but later corrected this to say that he saw the truck in the washout.

He continued by saying that Vera Sheppard, Steele, Michael Sullivan and McLellan went back to Cardigan with MacPhee. He said he realized they had struck bump after the whole thing was over.

Charles McLellan, Cardigan, farmer, stated that he had seen Steele at the forge at 11 a.m. and that the two of them had gone to Cardigan where Steele had purchased a bottle of wine. They went down to the shore, he said, where they drank the wine. Around noon he came home but about 2 p.m. he saw Steele again when he (Steele) was with Carl Cronin. The washout, he said, was almost directly over the culvert and extended about 18 inches towards the centre of the road from the ditch.

At this point Mr. Johnston objected to the photos be admitted as evidence, but withdrew his contention when Mr. Justice McGuigan pointed out that they had already been submitted as evidence. Mr. Johnston also requested that
