ELLEN'S DIARY

Blooms Bring Beauty Touch To Disgarded Pig's Trough

"It's amazing what can come out of a pig's trough, isn't it?" Mack smiled stopping beside one we had appropriated in the early summer for a base-planting we had fancied. "Little and larger pigs, eh? or..." "...snapdragons!" we chuckled.

So pretty these days, those are, that have flourished in their humble container, as they reward us with a wealth of blossoms, in a number of beautiful shades. We see the family stop to admire them — even Peter, the baby-lad, who stoops down to catch the scent of the flowers. We recalled the dampish morning we had transplanted the seedlings to it from a flowerbed, where they were being crowded out by larger plants.

Alex was our willing and knowing helper.

James had come to the yard in the little truck from some outing to the fields, where he had been taking stock of the crops: wondering if this piece of grain had been perhaps seeded too well, or that one, not quite well enough, and making a mental note to gauge his next sowings better; noting too the exact boundry of the spread lime in the growing crop, and resolving that maybe it would be the better of "another sprinkle there on the far-off side" in another spring; surveying the area of stumpland, to make plans to have it dozed before too long, and, added thus to the cultivated fields, "grow a bite for something."

"What are you doing with the old trough?" he asked curiously of the one we were then setting down by the verandah to the rear of the house.

"We're going to fill it with earth, and plant flowers in it" Alex volunteered.

"If you don't need it" we added.

"No. But it's not...Well, I would make you a better one, Ellen. There should be a board or two around somewhere...Not today, but whenever I can get round to it" he said hurrying off to some chore at the barns.

"Let's keep on" Alex grinned. It's my 'pinion, he'll never get round to it — for they have so many things to do. They're busy!"

"Yes, much too busy to stop to help plant flowers" we nodded.

Now there is little to be seen of the container. The wealth of foliage conceals it. And the loveliness of the many striking blooms.

"Now, what does that house need?" a companion wondered not so long ago when we drove along a pretty country byroad. "It's a fine house. And a tidy yard. But it's not a place to remember, is it?"

"It needs a flower. Even a few dahlias or nasturtiums — or a bright geranium in an old pail to give it a woman's touch!" we suggested.

"Yes" she nodded, "that's what flowers do. It's like putting curtains at a bare window. It gives a place 'A woman's touch.'"

The binders of our harvesting moved past today, taking up the reaping in other (rented) fields.

Scampie, at the gateway, barked a greeting in the pleased yelps he reserves for the machines of these farms.

"That means" the barks indicated "they're getting on with their work!"

A harvest-day, only of sorts, this was. And to add to the family's concerns there was also the inconvenience caused by a broken idle pump.

Until tomorrow — — Diary — Good-night.....
