Not As Smart As He Thought

Of self pray never think too well; How smart you may be time will tell.

It was late in the afternoon. Chatterer the Red Squirrel saw Farmer Brown's boy take an ear of corn out to a certain tree in the Old Orchard and put it in a croch. He was busy there for several minutes. Just what he was doing Chatterer couldn't see for the Black Shadows already were creeping through the Old Orchard. It was high time for Chatterer to be back home in the Green Forest. It was separated from the Old Orchard by only an old croch. Hooty the Owl probably was out hunting already and Chatterer wants to be in his snug home in a hollow in a tree when Hooty is about.

Try as he would he couldn't loosen it.

Chatterer was waiting for just one thing, that ear of corn. If it wasn't too big for him to carry he would take it back to the Green Forest and hide it there. He knew Farmer Brown's boy was putting that corn out for Blacky the Crow to get early the next morning. He thought himself very smart to think of coming over there now and getting that corn instead of waiting until morning when Blacky would surely be on hand. Now Chatterer didn't need that corn. No, sir, he didn't need one kernel of that corn. He had more than enough of nuts, acorns and seeds in his secret storerooms to give him all he could eat through the rest of the winter no matter how long it might be. He was greedy. The more some folks have the more they want. Chatterer
