HOUSE BUILDING IN CANADA STILL LONG WAY FROM MEETING DEMAND

House building across Canada is still a long way from catching up with demand, a Canadian Press survey shows. In most cities rental accommodation is difficult to locate at an expense.

Of 12 major Canadian cities surveyed, five were building more houses this year than last, five were building fewer and the other three were constructing about the same.

Toronto, with 18,000 units built or planned for 1954, is leading Canada in house construction, and is well above its 1953 total of 12,070 new homes.

Price are high in comparison with other western Canadian cities. As much as $75 a month is asked for two-room unfurnished flats in a house.

Vancouver's "nomadic people" are blamed for a heavy volume of moving within the city. There is a higher percentage of rental units than owned. Building is keeping up with demand.
