Painting Damaged

LONDON (AP)—The Royal Academy has announced that a vandal deliberately poked a finger through a painting worth more than £28,000 ($84,000) during a private showing here. The academy said Thursday the painting, French master Pierre Bonnard's Terrace at Le Cannet, could only have been damaged by one of the guests at a special showing of works by the French artist. The area around the damaged painting had been roped off to keep crowds away from it, said the academy secretary, Humphrey Brooke More than 2,000 guests attended the special showing. "It appears to have been a woman's finger and an act of deliberate vandalism by one of our guests," Brooke said. "The damage could only have been caused by someone reaching over and using considerable violence. "Happily the damage can easily be repaired and it will not be possible to detect where it occurred." The picture had been lent for the exhibition by the trustees of the late C. Maresco Pearce, a London artist.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Peter's New Sled Claimed His Interest For A While

"This is the day," we said to a pair of lads about to set off along that familiar trail which takes them the mile out to the TCH, and in a short-cut worn by generations of scholars, across it, and by the "Kirkyard" to the River Road, where the old school a new all added, still "sitting sunning." Alex nodded, smiled. "Yes, this is the day: Blue Monday!" Mack grinned. "Overcast" we agreed, "but in no way blue." Blue skies January will surely give. Crisp white days, sparkling with frost diamonds, pictured nights of star and moonlight. This however was a gray day, from which in time came snowfall. Now the lights from the house across the lane, and that on the hill are veiled. Drifts sheet from roofs and we think that truly Winter is now here. "Better have the kettle full, Ellen," James says from his armchair, noting a gust of wind about the eaves. "And have we never known the power may go?" On farms, this is a worry of a storm nowadays. If this should happen, if this service becomes lost to us, we have our concerns. No lights, no water for the stock. The houses can manage for a time on that in the tank, but the animals soon become thirsty. When such a period occurs, even a brief one, we are happy when sooner or later we hear what is then actually "the sweetest music this side of Heaven" the water-pump into its regular rhythm, and the stock drinking again. "Is it a touch of the blues you have over the matter of school?" "Not exactly" Mack smiled, with some regret. "But another day at home would have helped the work considerably—given it quite a lift." "Whenever I get the blues" the president of a great foundation once said, "I take from my wallet an old scrap of paper with an unusual shopping list on it. This was the list my wife and I made 20 years ago, when I was asked to accept an important job in New York. We wrote down all the things we wanted in life: a pleasant home, good friends, health for the family, frequent opportunity to enjoy the outdoors, we both loved. We discovered that we already had all these things, and we agreed that the move to New York would not enhance them. A look at the shopping list of solid varieties is a great tonic I know for blues, and fortunately, every one can compile a similar list of his or her own blessings." Back to school, any blues dissolved presently in the anticipation of another nice schoolday. Mack and Alex went this morning, and yesterday to her classes, and studies on the Mainland, the one girl, their sister. In consequence Peter was left to his own amusements, his company Scamp and the white kitten. His Christmas sled claimed his interest for a time though he left it to join the farmers at the stables, where according to his grandfather, "he has the right grip on a fork-handle, and at the feeding and cleaning, he is quite a farmer already." The old clock checks off an hour. There is blown snow against a window. "It's a bit of a storm" James nods. "Let's have a spot of tea, and then to bed, so to rise in good time in the morning." Until tomorrow — Diary — Goodnight.

Student Panelists Complain At Hadassah Conference

TORONTO (CP) — A prominent Israeli woman answered with an invitation Thursday the complaint of three young Canadian Jews that they are not being offered the kind of challenges they want. Mrs. Raya Jaglom told the three student panelists at the Hadassah Wizo conference here that they should come to Israel which offers all the challenge they should need. Janice Goodman said she had worked with children in a non-Jewish group because she could find no comparable work among Jewish organizations, including Hadassah Wizo, the international women's Zionist federation. Marshall Devor, said Jewish young people are joining the United States Peace Corps because Jewish organizations do not present the chance to do something active. Alan Fink, the third student, said he believes Jewish youth must find ways to aid Israel and to alleviate the problems facing Jewry in such countries as Russia. However, he thought many young people considered themselves too busy to take on real commitments. Mrs. Jaglom said the Canadian students' attitude was in direct contrast to students in Israel who helped immigrants and fought for their country. Moderator Dr. Renja mia Schlesinger of Toronto said Mrs. Jaglom's remarks showed that adults will not listen to their children. Dr. Schlesinger said they also showed that Israelis do not understand Canadians. He said: "I am sick and tired of being misunderstood. The Israelis don't have any idea of what life is like here. They don't understand our youth. There must be a two-way bridge, not a one-way bridge with us expected to understand Israelis while they don't understand us."

Some women commented from the floor on the students' remarks. One said: "They're arrogant, just arrogant." Another told Miss Goodman: "Your generation has never known discrimination and been called a dirty Jew."

Dr. Schlesinger said the women's and Mrs. Jaglom's remarks were like beating the
