[Written for the Examiner.]

A Hundred Years Ago.

All honour to the men that swung
The axe with vigorous blow,
And cleared the forest for our homes
A hundred years ago.

They asked no aid from Church or State,
But trusted their strong arm,
And an ever-watchful Providence
To shield them from all harm.

Then let us yield the honour due
To the hardy pioneers,
Who braved the ills of savage life
Through all these trying years.

They sighed not for their native glens,
Nor Erin's vistas green,
Nor yet for Devon's sunny fields,—
Alas! the ocean rolled between.

Ah! they were men of iron will,
Who grasped the axe and hoe,
And trod the howling wilderness
A hundred years ago.

The rude huts by the river side,
Our hardy father's reared,
Time's ruthless march has swept away
All, all have disappeared.

Where once the firs and dark pines waved,
The golden harvests grow,
Thanks to the men who lived and toiled
A hundred years ago.

ther question."
