

POETRY.
WHAT YOUR HORSE ASKS YOU.
Going up hill, whip me not;
Coming down hill, hurry me not;
On level ground, I will trot;
Loose in stable, forget me not.
Of hay and corn, rub me not;
Of clean water, stint me not;
With sponge and water neglect me not;
Of soft, dry bed, deprive me not.
Tired or hot, wash me not;
If sick or old, chill me not;
With bit or reins, oh, jerk me not;
And when you are angry, strike me not.

NO TIME LIKE THE OLD TIME.
BY OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.
There is no time like the old time,
When you and I were young,
When the buds of April blossomed,
And the birds of spring-time sung.
The garden's brightest glories
By summer suns are nursed,
But O, the sweet, sweet violet us,
The flowers that open first!

There is no place like the old place,
Where you and I were born,
Where we looked first our eyes
On the splendours of the morn.
From the milk-white-breasts that warm'd us
From the clinging arms that bore,
Where the dear ones clustered 'round us,
That will look for us no more!
There is no friend like the old friend
That has shared our morning days,
No greeting like his welcome,
No homage like his praise;
Fame is the scentless snuffower,
With sandy grains of gold;
But friendship is the breathing rose,
With sweets in every fold.
There is no love like the old love,
That we courted in our pride;
Though our loves are fading, falling,
And we're leaving side by side,
There are blossoms all around us,
With the colours of our days;
And we live in borrowed sunshine
When the light of day is gone.

LITERATURE.
BREAD CAST UPON THE WATERS.

John Mallory was returning from his work with a woman sitting by the wall weeping bitterly.
John had a kind heart and was easily moved at the sight of distress, so he stopped and addressed the woman.
"You seem to be in trouble,"—that was what he said.
The mourner lifted her face and he saw that she was a young woman, scarcely more than a girl, in fact. But this did not lessen his pity at all; possibly it increased it, for his heart was human as well as kind.

"Trouble? Ah, yes; I have come such a long way and am fatigued—so much weary. I went to the people's doors, but they said, 'Go way, we have no room for strangers. Go to the hotel, why do you not?'"
"So I went to the hotel, but the landlord was worse than the rest. Oh, how he frightened me, he was so fierce! He called me a tramp—a thief—because he found I had no money, yet that was it; and he bade me go about my business, and I came out into the woods to die."
"Cheer up, then, if that's all," said John, "and come with me. My mother would drive you from her door, you may be sure."

John spoke truly. His mother's heart was like his own. She only needed to know that the girl was a stranger to give her a cordial welcome.
"Take off your things my dear," said she, removing the girl's shawl with her own hands, "and sit here by the fire. How you shiver, poor child. You are chilled to the bone."
"You are so kind—so very kind," said the visitor, taking the rocking-chair offered her; and when John saw that she was not only young but singularly beautiful, though thin and pale as though by recent illness.

"You're out of health. You're not fit to be abroad," said Mrs. Mallory. "How your mother would feel to see you looking so!"
"Alas, I have no mother," she said; and her tears began to flow afresh. "I will tell you my story."
"There, there, my sorry I said it. Never mind the story now, but after supper, when you are warm and comfortable, you shall tell us all about yourself, that is, all you wish to tell."

So when they had eaten their evening meal, and the table had been cleared, the young girl told her story.
She said her name was Estelle LeRoy; her father was a French refugee, but she was born in Canada some years after he had left his native country, he having married a Canadian. After the death of her mother he had come to Boston, hoping to be able to support himself and her by teaching his own language; but just as he found a situation which promised to be permanent he became very ill; the climate of this country had never agreed with him, and he was always mourning for 'la belle France.' He was sick a long time, and when he died he left her penniless.

Of her relatives in France she knew nothing, and although since her father's death she had written more than once to her mother's friends in Canada, no letters had ever been received in return. She believed she could find them, however, if she could get there, and that was her aim. What she had suffered since she left Boston she said she could never, never tell.
"It's all over now, my dear," said Mrs. Mallory, "so try to forget it, and just try to make yourself contented with us till you are better able to travel than you are now."

For a whole week Estelle stayed with the Mallorys, gaining in health and beauty every day, and developing a careless lightness of spirit gradually in contrast to her first depression.
That John was not insensible to her attractions may well be imagined, and what the consequences might have been I cannot tell, if his heart had not been already occupied. That being the case he showed his friendship by bringing his mother to see her.
Curious it was to see the two together. Mary, the staid New England girl, with her rosy cheeks, her calm blue eyes, and yellow hair; her plain dress and steady Northern tongue; and Estelle with her olive skin, and hair and eyes as dark as night, her fanciful idiomatic speech and her airy figure, which gave grace even to the worn garments which clothed it. It was the brown thrush and canary bird sitting side by side on an apple tree bough.

Still they got on well together, though two and kissed and hugged each other when they parted. But when Estelle parted from Mrs. Mallory, she hung on her neck as if it had been her own dear mother she was leaving.
John saw her safely on her journey, and when he took her hand to say farewell he left in it a small purse containing a sum sufficient to pay her expenses.
"I shall not forget you, never, never—no not till my dying day," said Estelle, with tears in her eyes. "The good God bless you for your kindness to the stranger—you and your mother, and the pretty Marie."

In a few weeks the Mallorys received a letter from Estelle, stating that she had reached her journey's end in safety, and was amongst friends.
In the course of time John and Mary were married, and settled down on the Mallory farm, and there for the present we will leave them.
One day a handsome travelling carriage drew up before the door of a hotel in a quiet New England village. It was an event in the history of that hotel, for never had such an establishment been there before.
A gentleman alighted from the carriage, and was followed by a beautiful and richly attired lady. Bobbing his bare head and waving his subordinates aside, the obsequious landlord led the way to the parlor, took the order of the distinguished guests and communicated them to his servants. There was an opening and shutting of doors, and a ringing of bells a rushing to and fro—in short a tumult as if the Queen had come.
When the travellers were left to themselves the lady burst into a merry laugh. "Oh, it's too droll, Sir Edward; it is the same landlord who, fifteen years ago, bade me begone for a thief and a tramp!"
"The villain! I should like to lay my hands over his back," said Sir Edward.
"It is a' well worth while—such an insignificant back," said the lady; "only don't take on airs, and think all this attention is for our carriage and horses and our clothes."
By and by the landlord made some further errands to the parlor, the lady who was sitting by the window remarked: "You have a pleasant little village here."
"As pleasant and thriving a village as any in the country," answered the delighted landlord.
"Do you know if there is a family by the name of Mallory living here?" asked she.
"There's a family by that name, ma'am—Mr. John Mallory."
"The same, no doubt. He's living—and his mother?"
"She died some six years ago, ma'am, and his well-remembered wife, the mistress of that 'come to the family'—'Misfortune'?"
"Then you don't know?" said the landlord, delighted to have some intelligence to communicate, but marveling much that this great lady could feel an interest in the Mallory family. "Well it's a great misfortune, and the worst of it is, it was all his own fault. If people will be so foolish they must make the consequences. There wasn't a more prosperous man in town than John Mallory, and his property being mostly in real estate, there was no reason why he shouldn't keep it always in his children's hands. For real estate does not take to itself wings and fly away as other riches do. But what does John Mallory do but sign a note for a friend, and now he's lost everything!"
"Everything?"
"Everything—just turned himself and family out of house and home. That is to say they'll have to go; there's no help for it."
"He's in the old place now is he?"
"He is, ma'am; but he won't be long; the sale takes place to-day."
"Thanks," said the lady; and then, as if to herself; "Poor John! so like him!"
"You know him then?" queried the landlord.
"He showed me a kindness once fifteen years ago. I was here also at that time. You do not remember it?"
"It is very strange but really it has escaped my recollection."
"Quite likely. It was before my marriage. And with this the landlord was forced to be satisfied.
The sale was over and John Mallory was wandering from room to room taking a mute farewell of the house which he could no longer call his own when his little daughter came to say that a lady was in the parlor and had asked for him.
"Very well," said he, supposing it to be some neighbor who wished to see him on a trifling matter of business; but when he opened the door a stranger stood before him.
She greeted him courteously, and then said, without any circumlocution: "I am the purchaser of your farm and I have brought you the deed, that you may see if it is all right."
He took it listlessly enough, but as he glanced over it his countenance changed.
"I do not understand," said he; and no wonder, for the deed was made out in his own name.
"So you, too, have forgotten me, as the big landlord up there; but maybe you will remember that," and she held out a queer little purse of nettled silk.
John Mallory fixed his startled gaze upon her face, and something in her instructive eyes, the smiling mouth, touched a long silent chord of memory. She saw it, and answering his look said: "Yes, I am Estelle LeRoy, and the same Providence which sent you to me in my despair has sent me to you in your time of sorrow. No thanks John Mallory. I do no more than requite your kindness to me and hardly that, so keep the deed I pray you. But the little purse, which that I will never part with."
She then told him that within two or three years after her return to Canada she had married an Englishman of rank, and had been in Europe most of the time since; but being now on a tour through the States they had come out of their way to visit those who had befriended her in her need.
"The dear mother is gone I hear; but the pretty Marie, she is well?"
"My wife is well, and will come herself and thank you for your great goodness."
"Not to-night, not to-night; but to-morrow Sir Edward will come with me, and we will talk it all over—the past and the present. He knows it all, and he will say the thanks are due from ourselves, not you."
And thus she proved a true prophet.

CARROTS FOR HORSES AND CATTLE.
No food of the kind is so keenly relished by horses as carrots; indeed, most horses prefer them to oats. Carrots when mixed with chaff, without corn, will keep horses in excellent condition for performing all kinds of labor. They may be fed from December to the beginning of middle of May, to which period, with proper care in this latitude, they may be preserved. They are especially beneficial for horses towards Spring, at which time oats may be added for a few weeks. In certain parts of Europe, farmers depend solely upon carrots for their winter allowance of hay, as winter food for their horses, without giving them any grain whatever; and it is asserted that by this mode of feeding farm horses a considerable saving of hay is effected, as compared with the usual custom of this country of feeding corn and hay. Draft and farm horses are given in the proportion of fifty to seventy pounds weight of carrots each per day on an average not allowing them quite so many in the very short days, and sometimes more in the Spring months, and a portion of the carrots are sliced in the cut chaff or at night with a moderate quantity of hay, in their racks; and with this food the horses will usually enjoy good health and vigor. There are persons who think that carrots only give a food to horses as injurious to their constitution; but this belief is without foundation other than prejudice. Experiments carefully conducted have proved that team horses, Winter and Summer, will perform ordinary work on carrots as a winter food, with the assistance of proper soiling in Summer and may be kept the entire year round upon the produce of an acre of land in carrots.

In establishments for trotting or racing horses, carrots are especially beneficial. Several years ago a young army officer at one of the Topka church choir a voice so sweet that his soul was touched. He sought the young singer's acquaintance, and found her struggling to make her way against poverty and study music. The officer pledged his fortune to enable her to go to Italy and finish her musical education in Florence and Milan. With womanly pride she declined the offer, and instead of going she pursued her studies in small towns in Boston. The Lieutenant's regard for her increased, and he renewed the offer of pecuniary aid, coupling with it a proposal of marriage. About four years ago she was married in New York, and at noon of the day the bride sailed for Italy and the husband for Arizona, whither he had been ordered by the Government. Every foreign mail brought him tidings of her success. She won a great triumph at Florence, and secured an engagement to sing at the leading theatres in Europe. She had determined to return to America in November, and to rejoin her husband in South California, where he was constructing a military telegraph. On September 24th she received the following telegram:—"Minnie died Aug. 24."
