real danger and said so.
"Do you think that Paddy the Beaver would have stopped what he was doing unless there had been?" asked Mrs. Lightfoot. "He is too good a worker to waste time when there is work to be done," she added.
Just then what seemed like a blacker shadow moved down at the other end of the pond. It moved out into a lighter place at the edge of the water. "It is one of those dreadful two-legged folks!" said one of the twins in a hushed voice.
Mrs. Lightfoot shook her head. "You're mistaken, my dear," said she.
The twins stared. "He has only two legs," cried the other twin. "You're mistaken, too," said his mother.
Just then Buster Bear, for of course that is who it is, dropped down on all four feet. The twins blinked. They never had seen Buster Bear. The only two-legged folk, except feathered folk they ever had seen were men and boys at a distance some of them hunters with dreadful guns. None of these had ever suddenly become four-legged as this one had. He was walking along the edge of that pond on all four legs.
"That," said Mother Lightfoot, "is Buster Bear."
"Would he hurt us?" asked one twin.
"He certainly would if he could," replied Mrs. Lightfoot. "Yes, my dear he certainly would."
"Would he hurt you?" was the next question.
"If I gave him the chance, he would," replied Mrs. Lightfoot. "Could he catch us if he chased us?" asked one of the twins.
"No," replied Mrs. Lightfoot promptly. "He isn't fast enough on those big feet of his. He knows it and you need not be afraid he ever will chase you. He may try to catch you by surprise. He surely will if you give him a chance. But if you don't let him get near enough for this there is nothing to fear from Buster Bear."
"Do you suppose he was after Paddy the Beaver?" asked a twin.
"He may have been. He would catch himself a Beaver dinner if he had the chance, but I doubt if he really tried to catch Paddy this time. Paddy saw him or heard him and got out of sight. At the same time he warned Mrs. Paddy and any of the children who were out," said Mrs. Lightfoot.
"How did he warn them?" asked a twin.
"Is anything the matter with your ears? Didn't you hear him slap the water with his tail and see the splash it made? That was his warning," explained Mrs. Lightfoot.
