A Prince County Viewpoint

The Case for the Milk-Producer

We attended a meeting of milk producers and distributors recently and listened to their reasons why milk prices should be increased. Their arguments seemed sound. It was stated that the price spread between the producer and distributor was very slightly more than in 1939, when the cost of living was less than 60% of what it is today.

The producers, in turn, though not quoting actual figures, made it clear that advancing prices of feed and equipment necessitated a still higher price for their product. Thorough investigation of their claims might change the picture, but we feel these men were giving, if not figures, at least facts that could scarcely be gainsaid. All right, let us concede that the case for the milk producer and distributor is a good one.

The Case for the Milk Consumer

The case for the consumer, at least the consumer in the lower-wage bracket, is at least as good. Authoritative sources have given their considered opinion that many low-income families, and these are very often the ones with a large number of children, are unable to buy enough milk at current prices to provide their children with sufficient quantities of this most important of all foods. Health experts have declared that the health of these children will inevitably suffer because of this.

Our Most Valuable Crop

Isn't it about time governments began to realize that favorable trade balances and flourishing industries are not the only things to worry about in the welfare of all the people to be considered?

Let us strive to have flourishing crops, flourishing markets, and most important of all, flourishing children. Our Government has introduced an all-embracing old-age pension scheme for the protection of the aged. Now, it's time the powers-that-be got busy on an all-embracing scheme for the protection of the young.
