ELLEN'S DIARY

Commonsense & Humour Are Nicely Blended Here

"But last Sunday when the wife was in church" our visitor of yesterday continued — "I had a headache myself and there was an ache in my bones. I was sure I was in for a bout with the flu. But it wore away. I'm feeling pretty well today — I picked up a magazine her sister gave her Christmas in a . . ."

"Subscription" we nodded.

"Yes. It happened to be there by the couch where I was resting. So I picked it up and read for awhile."

"There are good articles in some of those" we offered. "Nice stories, too!"

"Not bad" he agreed. "But the stories . . . I'm not crazy about that kind anyway. Too sentimental and silly. I don't mind a good western yarn though, once in a while. . . But it was funny" he chuckled. "You know how anxious they are about enlightening present generations in regard to this balderdash they call Sex? They've carried it to the extreme I'd say. . ."

"We were born too soon" we chuckled. "We were reared in old-fashioned schools of thought."

"And not bad at that" he nodded. "There's too much education and enlightenment nowadays as I see it. . . Well, the other day, I was driving from . . . toward home, and I picked up a little . . . on her way home from school. She's a cute youngster, bright and pretty and a good talker, though I doubt if she's all of six years yet. Anyway, we were chatting and all of a sudden she asked me "Would you want a baby at your house?"

"We might" I said "since we haven't any. But we'd have to have time to think it over. . . Why do you know where we could get one?"

"They're going to have one at 's house" she said. "And they have enough there already!"

"You're sure about this?" I asked her.

"Oh yes" she said "certain! Do you know what a smock is?" she asked me.

"It's what a man wears to keep the chaff from sticking to his sweater when he's in the barn at his work" I said.

"Oh, my goodness!" she laughed. "It's not much good trying to explain things to you. You don't know anything!"

"So there you are Ellen. It's as I said, too enlightened the young generations are. But when I was reading Sunday I happened to come to an article on the subject that had some sense to it. And believe me they're commencing to think they have been over-educated these years. They are beginning to think more of the beliefs taught — or not taught" he grinned "in grandmothers' day. And it's good that they are. The old folks handled their topics fairly well, as I recall it. And often we learned a lot from what they left unsaid! They were a wise crew — those old ones. . . But here comes the tractor now!" he said rising.

And there goes our day! A pretty day, blue-skied, clean and shining, furthering well, the interests of the farms.

Until tomorrow — — — Diary — Goodnight. . .

MARY HAWORTH

Must Rebuild His World

Dear Mary Haworth: I have been married eight years to a man whom I thought the most wonderful guy in the world—until last May, when he moved out suddenly, leaving a letter listing his grievances.

He concluded by saying he still thought me the most wonderful person he'd ever known, and that he wasn't leaving for another woman, but only because he no longer loved me. Six weeks later he was back. Meantime he'd maintained our home as usual, and we'd been in almost daily contact by phone.

Now I learn that he was seeing another woman in that interval; and they've since broken up. Presently he admits being involved with another woman (mother of children), separated from her husband. He says he isn't in love with her, and promises to stop seeing her; but neither is he love with me, he says.

WON'T CO-OPERATE

He plans to leave again; says he is confused and wants to live alone. I have advised professional help—to no avail. I asked him to co-operate in consulting a clergyman, marriage counsellor or older person; he refuses. He just wants to leave; doesn't want to be married, although he still prides me to the sky.

I am at a loss. I don't know if I should let him go easily, or put up a fight to hold him. I do love him and would like to keep my home together. But this strain, and who he's seeing, is becoming too much for me.

He sells insurance and works with loads of women. We are in our early thirties and have a young son, whom he says he loves, and who worships the ground his father walks on. I would appreciate any advice you can give me. H. S.

CHAOTIC CONDUCT

Dear H. S.: This is a man confused by the chaos of his own behavior—or misbehavior. As a result of trifling with other women, taking the course of least resistance, he has forfeited (for the time being) his capacity to love a wife wholeheartedly.

That is the essence of adultery—to adulterate one's capacity to love. It rules out totality, conviction and contentment. It sabotages emotional integrity and distorts personality. It weakens the will, clouds the mind, depresses the soul—and cuts off the current of spiritual grace (which operates on behalf of those who stick to the rules of righteous living.)

Karl (let's call him) feels that he is no longer the person he was in relation to you, before he got involved with other women. He feels lost, alienated from his former self, the self you still take him to be, in your loyalty and innocence of mind. Your innocence has to do with not having sinned his kind of sin; hence you don't see through his eyes.

MUST REBUILD

For him, his world has changed. Much as Eden changed for Adam, after his fall from grace, I suppose. And now he thinks if he pulls up stakes and goes away, he may blunder into another garden of paradise. But of course he won't. His trouble is within his own consciousness; and there is where he must repair the mistake, and reconstruct his happiness.

Your intuition is sound — that his problem calls for professional help, to get him back on the beam of heart wholeness. In the town through which you write, some of the leading churches afford psychiatrically slanted pastoral counselling, which would be ideal for him, I think.

He needs to see for himself the pattern of his confusion. And to form durable associations with right-minded people—as an antidote to his lone wolf behavior, and to nourish and sustain good character, by acquiring wholesome habits and interests. Have him read this, and then try again to win him to reason. M.H.

Long Ago Burns Concert Still Make Good Reading

"There was music, mirth and melody for the multitude, mixed with eloquent oratory, graceful dancing and magnificent Highland reels." This was the rhetorical headline in an old newspaper for a Burns concert held in Charlottetown in 1909. The enthusiasm of description could apply to Saturday's concert given in the P.W. C. Hall. Many of the people who performed at the 1909 concert are living on the Island and in other parts of Canada and U.S.

The oration of the evening, referred to in the old paper, was illustrated by stereopticon views and works of Burns. The article goes on to say the lecture on Burns was delivered by Rev. T. D. Fullerton whose magnificent effort was worthy of the theme worthy of the inspiring occasion, and worthy of himself. It was an eloquent eulogy of Burns of whom Dr. Fullerton said his pen like a scimitar smote with lengthy strokes injustice to the poor, the pride of false aristocracy, cant and sham — strokes that cut deeply and did not cut in vain. It was a glowing tribute to the poet whose works of an all too brief lifetime represent drama, humour, passion, sweetness and sympathy and who sang the Man's seal of humanity "A man's a man for a' that."

That was the end of the coverage of that era for the address of the remarkable T. F. Fullerton, affectionately known as "Tommy Fullerton." It was an age of oratory and there was no finer in the land than the late T. F. Fullerton, who later became Dr. Fullerton.

In February of that same year 1909, there were again the bold headlines and again much alliteration. "A Lovers' Tribute to the Land He Loves So Well," was given by lecturer Rev. Dr. Campbell speaking on "Bonnie Scotland." This was described as "an oratorical effort that Charlottetown will long remember. For an hour and a half with the fluency that fascinates, the literary style that charms, and the earnestness that enthralls Dr. Campbell presented to his hearers impressions of his trip to Scotland." (Not too many attempts to hold an audience for an hour and a half to-day.)

That is the end of some of the coverage of that address. Styles

The minutes of last meeting were read, approved and signed. Mrs. Wonnacott reported that she had sent a Christmas Card to the Horsell W.I. The March of Dimes contribution and the renewing of the Institute news will be decided at the February meeting.

The following committees were appointed. Sick committee, Mrs. White, Mrs. Waye and Mrs. MacRae. School committee, Mrs.
