OPINION: Remember that movie where Andrew McCarthy plays Jonathan Switcher, an artist trapped inside the body of someone who is utterly inept at any job he tries, and after a few disastrous career attempts, he finds himself working at a mannequin factory where he builds a mannequin whose beauty at last makes him feel like a true artist, but his perfectionism and slow work means that he is once again looking for a new career which leads him to work at a big department store where, coincidentally, his mannequin has ended up, and the mannequin comes to life as Emmy, an ancient time-travelling Egyptian princess who has never before been satisfied with her life in other timezones, and only Jonathan can see her alive, and their relationship inevitably causes much suspicion and rumours among the department store, so conspiring store manager Mr Richards, played by McCarthy's long-time pal James Spader hilariously pursues the truth about the mannequin with quotable lines like: 'You people who work at night scare me', and the mannequin inspires Jonathan to create the most stunning store display windows in Philadelphia, and his profile as a designer rises in the process, but the store security guard Felix and his dog 'Rambo' are also working the case, and will stop at nothing to uncover the secret behind Switcher's mad artistic genius: 'Oooh Switcher..you are one sick puppy' (Felix to Jonathan on seeing him cavorting with the wooden Mannequin), and eventually, as the windows help the department store back into profit, even the rival stores get interested in the action and try to poach Jonathan's talents, namely 'Illustra' - the company of sleezy tycoon B.J Wert, and in a crazy bid for his services, they steal his mannequin and take her to the Industrial Mannequin Chopper in Illustra's storeroom? Neither do I.
