

A Protest.

THERE are some positions which demand from their occupants a special consideration for the feelings of all classes, and even of each individual of the community.

We believe that the position of a teacher, particularly that of a teacher in our higher institutions of learning, is one which has duties and claims in this respect similar to those of the higher and more dignified public officers.

We need not say that we are referring to the attack upon Senator Carvell, lately made by the Herald. We are well aware that the courtesies of literary men allow any writer to preserve an incognito if he wishes, and that to attempt to remove a disguise, however slight, is a piece of rude impertinence.

Now let us put aside, as quite irrelevant, the question who the person attacked is. What we say has no reference to this particular case. We are defending a principle.

Suppose any person thus attacked wishes to send a son to the Prince of Wales' College,—in what position would he find himself? He wishes his son to respect those who are to teach him.

Could he do so in this case? We ask any parent in the community (whatever may be his views about this appointment) to suppose the case his own, and to say if there has not been here a shameful neglect of public obligations?

But this matter reaches beyond the one person attacked. We are quite sure that there is a large number of persons in the community who think that newspaper articles, such as the one we refer to, are most injurious and demoralizing in their effect.

The editor of the Herald and Professor of the Prince of Wales College has also thought it not unbecoming his position to consult, in this article, a church congregation in the community. What he said may or may not be true. We are not discussing that question now. But, for one occupying his position to publish such a statement, is a gross outrage.

The Prince of Wales College has an honorable record. It has gained this because those who were responsible for its teaching devoted themselves to their special duties, abstained from anything inconsistent with their high position, and, respecting their office and themselves, won the respect of the community.

Since the Herald publishes such articles, the name of Mr. Caven should be removed either from the paper or from the staff of the Prince of Wales College.

A Mirage.

Sir,—On Friday, the 9th inst., the view from the "Head" to beyond the Harbor's mouth, shewed, in the north-west, a beautiful mirage. It appeared through a slight haze, raised somewhat above the level of the land lying between it and the spectator, presenting in the foreground a dark, glassy spot of water, bounded by a coast, every outline of which was sharply defined.
