Admiral Mares Plea For Nuclear Safety

WASHINGTON (AP)—With a warning about accidents and disasters, the admiral today pleaded for nuclear safety. Vice-Admiral Hyman Rickover, asked the U.S. Congress to write into law a program for selecting and training men for the navy's nuclear fleet. Apparent still leading with the official title of "father of the atom," the admiral said he was "not a nuclear power" but a "nuclear safety" man. He spoke to the committee as it rode on the navy's first nuclear-powered aircraft carrier, the Enterprise, during a shakedown cruise last March 31 and April 1. Several years ago it took congressional intervention to prevent Rickover from being passed over the promotion from captain to admiral, which would have forced him to retire from the navy and as head of the nuclear development program. "I think it should be by law," Rickover, who will be 63 Jan. 27, faces mandatory retirement in January, 1964, he said. But he told the committee as long as he is able and both I and others feel I can do a good job, I would like to stay on it."

This brought the comment from Representative Mervyn Price (Dem. Ill.): "I do not think Congress is going to stand idly by and watch you put the shelf Congress has expressed itself on this matter, and if further action is required, we are not reluctant to act." Rickover said the special nuclear selection and training program "is quite foreign to the way most things are done in the military."

"That is why I am pretty certain that ultimately the navy will dismember this organization, because they cannot tolerate an organization of this type. It does not fit into the neat pattern of navy organization. Rickover said the present navy nuclear training was established by presidential order. "I think it should be by law," he said.

Belgrade (Reuters) — Albania has officially told the Communist Council for Economic and Cultural Co-operation that it has severed all relations with the organization, the Yugoslav news agency Tanjug reported Saturday. Coconec is the Soviet bloc equivalent of the European Common Market.

PAID FIR RELEASE
Families of several of the prisoners obtained the freedom of their loved ones by making individual payments to Castro. Guillermo Alonso Pujol, former Cuban vice-premier, paid $100,000 for his son, Jose Alonso Pujol. Also freed for $100,000 was Fabio Freyre, former sugar grower. Freed for $50,000 each were Jorge Gobin, son of the owner of the Havana Post, English-language newspaper, that went underground after Castro took power. Freddie Gonzalez Dufan, son-in-law of Anastasio Somoza, Senate president during the Fulgenzio Batista regime, and Antonio Carbonell. Hope for liberation of the prisoners had never been dimmer when New York lawyer James Donovan entered the picture. The Cuban crisis over Russian rockets on Castro's front porch appeared certain to wreck exchange plans but Donovan learned through exile sources by Oct. 26 that the Castro government was keeping the negotiations open. The climax came Sunday when word was flashed — the 1,113 prisoners were being freed.
