Wild Scenes In House Followed Last Closure

By JAMES NELSON

OTTAWA (CP)—Wild scenes of disorder in the Commons and the end of a Parliamentary era flowed from the last use of debate-limiting closure in the 1956 pipeline debate.

It gave Canadian history a low-water mark in Parliamentary prestige and decorum, Black Friday.

It saw Rene Beaudoin, a promising and expert Speaker of the Commons, discredited with an unprecedented censure motion against him by the opposition.

It brought broken health to the Conservative opposition leader, George Drew, forcing him out of active politics, a man who might have been prime minister.

It ultimately broke the back of a government, ending the 22-year reign of the Liberals under prime ministers Mackenzie King and Louis St. Laurent.

BROUGHT DIEF TO FORE

It also brought to the fore as the defender of parliamentary rights, the Conservative MP for Prince Albert — John Diefenbaker—who became the new prime minister after the 1957 election with a promise, among other things, of abolishing closure.

The Commons has not since returned to the quietly efficient way of doing things that prevailed before it.

In 1956, the late C. D. Howe, then minister of trade and commerce, proposed a treasury loan of up to $80,000,000 to Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited to help the company build the Prairie section of its $375,000,000 pipeline from Alberta to Montreal.

The loan had to be approved by June 7 if the start was to be made by the end of the year.

Mr. Howe opened debate May 14 and in his opening speech gave notice of closure. The resolution had already been on the Commons order paper for six days and opposition Conservative and CCF MPs had declared outside the House and in they would fight it with every device available.

OPPOSITION ASTOUNDED

The opposition was astounded when Mr. Howe proposed closure at the end of his first speech on the bill. They complained this was not cutting off a long, protracted debate that had bogged down, but preventing any proper discussion at the very start of a debate.

Mr. Howe applied closure three more times, at every stage of the pipeline bill's passage, further incensing the opposition. But the bill was passed before the deadline.

Before 1956, closure had been used in the Canadian Commons only seven times, the last time in 1932.

The closure rule in the Canadian Commons has been traced back to a device evolved by the late Arthur Meighen, Conservative prime minister, in the great naval debate of 1913.

Under the rule, a cabinet minister gives notice one day that on the next sitting day he will move debate on a measure be not further adjourned.

SPEECHES LIMITED

A vote is taken immediately to agree or not. Then speeches are limited to 20 minutes each—instead of the normal 40 minutes—and the issue is settled by a vote at 1 a.m. the following morning. Normally, the Commons rises at 10 p.m.

In the 1956 pipeline debate Conservative and CCF members fought bitterly on every procedural ground they could find. Sittings were stretched out to 3 or 4 a.m. by tangled procedural argument. Spectators jammed the galleries

In all the wrangling over the rules and the interpretation of them by Speaker Beaudoin, there was little discussion of the merits of the pipeline bill. The whole subject of debate was the government's determination to push the bill through Parliament against a deadline.

One bitterly-contested ruling by Mr. Beaudoin sparked an open rebellion against the authority of the chair, numerous opposition MPs storming into the centre aisle to shout at him. CCF leader M. J. Coldwell, now retired, strode to the very foot of the clerk's table, brandishing a clenched fist over the mace and complaining of dictatorship. It was Black Friday, June 1, 1956.

When Mr. Diefenbaker succeeded Mr. Drew as Conservative leader in December that year he embarked on a crusade against abuse of parliamentary rights. He promised to abolish the closure rule and introduced motions in subsequent sessions while prime minister to delete it from the rule book.

NEW BARONET ALSO BUTLER

LONDON (AP) — Sir Andrew Cosmo Lewis Duff-Gordon, the eighth baronet, said here he enjoys his work as a part-time butler.

"In no way am I ashamed of the work," said Sir Andrew. "As a matter of fact, I enjoy it."

The baronet, 31, inherited the title, a country house and a 4,000-acre estate in Radnorshire last spring on the death of his father, Sir Douglas Duff-Gordon.

"Unfortunately," said Sir Andrew, "most of the land is fairly useless. It's not very arable, but perhaps I can do something with it one of these days."

He works by day as an insurance underwriter but in the evenings hires out as a butler.

"I learned from my grandfather's butler, George," he said. "He was a very good butler."

As butlers go, Sir Andrew's charges are not excessive. He averages £3 ($9) an evening.

Sir Andrew himself doesn't employ a butler.

"I don't have money enough for one," he said.

As a butler, Sir Andrew is known as Charles.

"It's a good name for a butler," he said.

Opening lead — two of diamonds.

Sam Fry, Jr. (South) was playing with Harry Fishbein in the 1954 Summer National Championships in Washington. They were using weak two bids, reserving two clubs as the forcing bid.

Fishbein's two diamond response was negative, but the jump to three notrump showed some values, though not enough to justify an initial affirmative response. Fry naturally went on to a slam, which he knew would at worst depend on a finesse.

The slam contract would normally have gone down one, but Fry wound up making the hand as the result of an extraordinary play he made.

West had a difficult choice of opening leads and came out with a diamond. It became obvious at once to Fry that the slam depended on the heart finesse, since there was an automatic spade loser.

The problem was to try to make the hand even if the heart finesse lost. Fry sized the situation up quickly when he played the queen of diamonds from dummy faster than you can say Sam Fry.

East played the king and South the ace. Declarer then led a club to the jack and took the heart finesse, which lost. West, misled by the play of the queen, triumphantly led the jack of diamonds, but Fry ruffed it. Fry then drew two rounds of trumps and easily made the rest of the tricks by cashing his hearts.

West had no way of knowing that East had the ace of spades, and it is hard to fault him for trying to cash the jack of diamonds. From his viewpoint, it was much more likely that South had started with the A-x of diamonds than it was that East had the ace of spades.

Fry had taken the precaution of playing only one trump, so that East had no opportunity to give a spade signal.

Security Ratings For MPs Seen Possible RCMP Action

OTTAWA (CP)—Are members of Parliament given security ratings by the RCMP?

Progressive Conservative MP Gordon Fairweather said he didn't know the answer to this intriguing question.

But he said he rather suspected that he and his colleagues, as well as other Canadians, do have their own personal dossiers in the RCMP's secret files.

Mr. Fairweather, who represents the New Brunswick constituency of Royal, was a member of a panel discussion on human rights sponsored by the Canadian Citizenship Council.

The question of security came up during a seminar on the country's need to protect its secrets, and the possible effect this protection might have on individual liberties.

Members of the seminar said more information should be made public about Canada's security procedures.

The public had a right to know what the basic security measures were, how they worked, and how an individual might be able to make an appeal if he felt he was being wrongly branded as a poor security risk.

The New Brunswick MP, who is a member of the Commons defence committee, told the human rights gathering that he did know members of Parliament were not cleared for certain detailed information about NATO.

He said he discovered this during the defence committee's visit to NORAD headquarters at Colorado Springs.

"Every time we got into some interesting topic we were backed away."
