THE DAILY EXAMINER.

JUNE 23, 1887.

Varia.

Mr. Gladstone, the indefatigable, has been addressing large audiences in Wales. One of his speeches was a characteristically odd one, for he undertook to prove that Wales had a Nationality because there were so many Welsh castles. He said:—"I believe that Mr. Pennant, a careful antiquary, estimates the number at 161, and that there is a greater number of castellated remains in and around little Wales than in all the rest of England put together. How came they about? If they did not build castles round Yorkshire or Lancashire, but in Wales, there was that which we call a separate nationality, and notwithstanding the enormous superiority of England in numbers and force, this nationality could not then be controlled except by building these multitudes of castles." If the right hon. gentleman had referred to so well-known a manual as Goodwin's Archaeological Handbook, he might have gleaned the following facts: 1. That so many castles were built in England during the reign of King Stephen that his successor, Henry II., destroyed 1,150 of them. 2. Goodwin gives a list of nearly three hundred English castles, and at least as many licenses that enrolostate granted between 1256 and 1478. In the county of Northumberland alone there were, in 1468, no fewer than 37 castles and 78 towers. This notion that the Principality was over-castled is, therefore, a pure delusion, and the inference that there was a struggling nationality to be kept down in Wales, and not one in England, is equally groundless.

One mode adopted for celebrating the post-Jubilee year will be to issue a new set of coins and a medal. The effigy on the latter is an excellent portrait of her Majesty, but that on the former is less admirable. The reverse of the medal is an allegorical group, and therefore silly. The arms on the florin and double florin are displayed on four shields with sceptres saltire-wise between them; but the heraldic tinctures are omitted. I am glad to see that the trivial wreath and inscription on the present shilling and sixpence are to be replaced by the royal arms and the Garter, but I cannot join in the applause which has been bestowed upon the George of Patrucco, which is retained for the sovereign. It is not likely that anybody going out to fight dragons would forget to put on any clothes except a helmet, a cloak, and a pair of shoes. Lances used, no doubt, to be splintered when knights tilted at each other's shields, but as that of St. George has gone clean through the dragon, it is difficult to see why it should have broken; and though the attitude of the Saint might have been appropriate if he were galumphing back after having slain the jabbawock, it looks absurd to see him preparing to continue the combat with a sort of putty-knife, for he could hardly have touched the beast with it, except at the peril of tumbling off. I cannot but think that the Tudor George was much more sensibly designed. A great point has been made by the critics of the new form of the crown. Instead of being shown as worn, it is a mere toy perched on the top of the head-dress, but the designer may have unconsciously indicated the eclipse which has fallen on the Court since the death of the Prince Consort.

A report is in circulation that when the Queen a short time ago visited the ministry of La Grande Chartreuse, she did so by virtue of the special permission of the Pope, and that Her Majesty declined to partake of the hospitality offered to her. It is quite true that a council has forbidden, under severe penalties, men to enter the convents of Christian nuns, and women the monasteries of monks. But there is an express exception in the case of bishops and crowned heads. A Carthusian Monk writes to the Pall Mall Gazette regarding Her Majesty's visit and with reference to these points:—"Bishops are always aged men; they lead saintly lives, and when any of them presents himself before the gate of a convent the whole community is assembled to receive him. The movements of crowned heads are always public, their high position leaves no room for temptation to the cloisters, and their visits to these places are always accompanied by the pomp and the circumstance which become their great dignity, and which exclude the possibility of affording any food for either suspicion or scandal. No rule, therefore, was violated, no custom was momentarily forgotten, no exception was made in favor of Her Britannic Majesty. Queen Victoria had a perfectly legal right to be admitted into the old cloisters, and to be conducted through all the cells, and to be shown everything which she wished to see from the top to the bottom of the aged pile. But to be received into cloistered convents, kings must be actually reigning; and to be admitted into the monasteries of the same kind, queens must be actually reigning; so that, were Her Majesty of England to abdicate to-morrow, and knock just the next day at the old gate of La Grande Chartreuse, or at that of any of the houses of the order, she would not be allowed to cross the threshold of any of them."

With regard to the second point he says:—"Her Majesty did not dine, because no notice of her visit had been sent beforehand to Father General, and so there was no time for preparing a dinner for the royal party. But the modest queen partook very heartily of a collation, which was composed of chocolate, biscuits, jellies, and confectioneries of various kinds." Furthermore the Queen asked whether there were any of her subjects in La Grande Chartreuse, and learning that there was a young Englishman among the 'sons of St. Bruno,' Her Majesty visited him in his cell. She sat down on an old straw chair close by him, and chatted with him maternally for nearly half an hour. She piously recommended both herself and her faithful subjects to his good prayers; and she was so highly pleased with his edifying conversation that she went the length of requesting him to give her a little 'souvenir' which would enable her later her return to England, to recall to her mind the pleasure she derived from her visit to him and the Grande Chartreuse. He at once presented to her a small silver crucifix, of very ancient date and very fine workmanship. It was the only thing of any value that he had in his cell.

Dr. Charles Mackay, writing lately to the Daily Telegraph, respecting the melody of "Home Sweet Home," the authorship of which is from time to time brought into controversy, said:—"In one of our very many conversations on well-known English melodies, I took occasion to ask Sir Henry Bishop for information on the subject; and he thereupon favored me with the whole history. He had been engaged in his early manhood by the once eminent firm of Gouling, D'Almaine & Co., musical publishers, of Soho Square, to edit a collection of national melodies of all countries. In the course of his labours he discovered that he had no Sicilian melody that he thought worthy of reproduction, and as a 'Sicilian melody' had been announced in the prospectus, Sir Henry thought he would invent one. The result was the now well-known air of 'Home, Sweet Home,' which he compared to the verses of an American author, Mr. Howard Payne, then resident in England."

The Rev. Samuel Simpson, a well-known English clergyman, who died in the month of March last, aged 82, wrote to Robert Southey, who happened to be staying at the time with the poet Wordsworth, with a request for his autograph, and Southey dashed off the following reply:—"Inasmuch as you, Sam, the descendant of Sim, For collecting handwritings have taken a whim, And to me, Robert Southey, petition have made, In a civil and nicely-penned letter, post-paid, That I, Robert Southey, so gracious would be, As to fill up a page there appointed for me, Five complements I send you, by aid of the nine, They will cost you in postage a penny a line, At Kiswick, October the sixth, they were done, One thousand, eight hundred, and twenty, and one."

Give Them a Chance!

That is to say, your lungs. Also all your breathing machinery. Very wonderful machinery it is. Not only the larger air-passages, but the thousands of little tubes and cavities leading from them. When these are clogged and choked with matter which ought not to be there, your lungs cannot do their work. And what they do, they cannot do well. Call it cold, cough, croup, pneumonia, catarrh, consumption or any of the family of throat and nose and head and lung obstructions, all are bad. All ought to be got rid of. There is just one sure way to get rid of them. That is to take Boschee's German Syrup, which any druggist will sell you at 75 cents a bottle. Even if everything else has failed you, you may depend upon this for certain.

WOMAN and her diseases is the title of a large illustrated treatise, by Dr. R. V. Pierce, Buffalo, N. Y., sent to any address for 10 cts. in stamps. It teaches successful self-treatment. sat
