WOMAN AND HOME.

SOMETHING ABOUT THE TALKED OF HYGIENIC UNDERGARMENTS.

The Education of Girls—Keeping Clean. The Model For Good Women—Development of Women's Clubs—Society Women and Their Children.

Mrs. Lucy E. Switzer of Cheny, Wash., writes: I do not think the pleas made through the press for hygienic undergarments will convert the masses of women to their use. The objections, I think, will be these: Too expensive and not warm enough, for a majority, for all seasons of the year. A wool or camel's hair, silk or cotton union suit, with a silk divided skirt and a dress worn over them does not make up an apparel warm enough in winter. Then how many can afford to wear (in proportion to the whole population) silk divided skirts? To the chemilette there are objections—difficulty of making them to fit nicely, the rapidity with which they wear out and the fact that the body about the waist and the shoulders will be too warm dressed in a union suit, chemilette, comfort corset, or under waist, and the dress waist.

In summer the union garment, the divided skirt and the dress will clothe the person warmly enough, and the material for each can be selected to suit the climate, habits and health of the woman. In winter a pair of knit wool drawers, a pair of cotton drawers or leglets knitted at home of german wool or yarn, finished with a yoke at the top, can be worn over the union garment and under the divided skirt.

When I began wearing the divided skirt, I had some made of cotton material from a pattern procured from Dr. Orpha Baldwin, who lectured in our state some years ago. This cotton material can be bleached (white) sheeting, butcher's linen or any colored cotton stuff. For the colder seasons I have added cotton flannel (red), outing flannel and heavy wool flannel.

The farmers' wives, the housekeepers, the helpers in the kitchen, the working women of all classes need to have the advantage of these comfortable undergarments. Many of them do not probably read very much or think very much on this one line, and a programme of this under apparel should be presented to them that will commend itself for comfort as to warmth and that will not go beyond their capacity in expense or beyond the expense of their present way of dressing.

The divided skirts as I wear them are finished at the top with a wide sort of bias band, and this band is buttoned on to a long underwaist longer than a basque. These underwaists may be made of white cotton goods, colored silesia or of butcher's linen, or cotton flannel if desired.

Now as to the union suit. After several years' experience and experimenting, I have evolved one that I like very much. After having made and worn 10 suits of cotton, silk, wool and camel's hair, I now do not cut off the back of the vest at the bottom as before, but I sew the top of the drawers to it and on the inside of the vest. Thus the vest will fall out the outside of the drawers when worn, which almost entirely removes the objection to the union suit made in this way. Indeed it is warmer than the regulation union garment.

Before I began to wear the divided skirt I wore the long underwaists and attached my skirts to them. If white or any cotton goods were worn for skirts, the waist and skirt were sewn together as one garment, and if the skirt were moreen or any other stiff goods, unwashable, the skirt and waist were fastened together by buttons. The divided skirts I like much. May the day speedily arrive when we can adopt the hygienic dress also.

The Education of Girls.

There is no subject that so deeply interests the thinking people of our country as that of rational education for our girls, and there is none that is productive of so little real advantage to the girls from the many discussions that the subject occasions. Plans are considered and laid aside, and theories rise only to fall again, and meanwhile the girl speeds on toward womanhood, misdirecting her energies and wasting valuable time through lack of well defined plans for her best advantage on the part of her guardians and educators.

We cannot overdo the matter of discreetly rearing our girls. They are to be the wives and mothers of our next generation, and on them rests the prosperity of the nation. The world is to be largely influenced by their abilities and strength, and it rests with the educators of today to prepare them for the great work that is before them. The keynote of harmony in mental and physical education has not yet been touched and will not until their physical well being is made supreme and the mental is based on this power. The time has never been in our country when this has been practically considered. Regardless of physical resources mental expansion has ever been and still is the aim and has grown to such a craze in America that brain power is often forced to the exhaustion of all other capabilities.

When our girls thus forced graduate, they are, even if they escape invalidism, utterly without stamina and are poorly prepared for entering cheerfully upon the arduous duties that await them in everyday life and also are unfortified for rising above the disappointments and anxieties that enter to a greater or less extent into every home.

Their career closes at their graduation instead of being at its dawn, and many a bright intellect that gave promise of strength everywhere burns but dimly in an obscure circle from being caged in an enfeebled and exhausted body.—Marguerite Lindly in Godey's.

Keeping Clean.

She was a very trim young woman with that clean, smart appearance which we call well groomed for want of a better term. Her hair was parted in the middle to a plain severity, her linen collar and cuffs were spotless, and the hem of her dress skirt as free from dust as that of an evening gown. One would notice her among a whole roomful of girls. She entered the car with her shoulders thrown back and her head erect. That showed hours of dumbbell exercise and Indian club swinging.

But tagging closely to her heels came one of those dear, sloppy looking little girls with tumbling down hair and torn veil. She didn't wear either collars or cuffs. The buttons on her jacket were hanging on by single threads, and as she sunk down meekly beside her scrupulously clean companion she sighed and whisperingly remarked, "I don't see why I always look so untidy and can't understand how you keep yourself so smoothly dressed." Then she vainly tried to conceal a torn glove finger and a pair of soiled overshoes.

"I've made a study of dressing properly, my dear," the other answered, "and I've found that there is only one way to always look neat. It is by spending every spare moment in 'cleaning up.' If you once begin it, I can just tell you that you'll have to stop your painting lessons and everything else. Another thing, I always steer clear of these new things, like green or purple veils, and wear what is most becoming. I wouldn't think of going shopping in a light colored costume; it would soon get soiled, and then my clean makeup would be ruined. To be sure, I've had to cut down on soda water and candy, because my laundry bills are so large, and the new mannish shoes and gloves are awfully expensive, but that's the only way to get the effect, so I have to stand it."—Chicago News-Record.

The Model For Good Women.

What an obstinate, curious set we women are, to be sure! We do not like to be called strong minded because the frivolous ones among us regard that state of mental being as incompatible with style, and yet we would resent very vigorously the assertion made by any one that we were weakminded. Of course we would, yet what do we want? Is there any half way term suggestive of just that correct balance that we are anxious to acquire?

Perhaps no word aptly fills the bill, but the state can be acquired, and it will repay us for any little sacrifices we may be compelled to make or real work that must be undergone to reach it. No man admires a woman whose intellectuality makes her forget all about the most becoming arrangement of her hair, nor does he fancy the extremist who regards books as of secondary importance to personal beauty, and whose every remark is punctuated by the commas semicolons and periods of self praise, fadious comment and inane small talk.

There is a happy medium that combines wit and wisdom with womanly grace that does not air its superiority and that is not above a desire to please by both mental and personal attractiveness. That is the type to copy. Become less of extremists, y great world of women, and your lives will be longer, your homes happier and you souls more tranquil in the serenity of a combination of strength and weakness self reliance and dependence, that make you far more winning than if you are given over entirely to one side or the other.—Philadelphia Times.

Development of Women's Clubs.

"The woman's club in its full development is something more than a study class," says Florence Howe Hall. "What we learn from papers and essays is only a part of what we learn from club life. The friction with other minds, so stimulating and invigorating, the spirit of club life, which springs from sharing together the mental and moral feast that exhilarates us all, and from the good will and mutual good fellowship engendered by working and thinking and sometimes playing together, all these form a large part of the intangible but precious essence of club life; hence club growth should be toward that free and open discussion in which all may share at one time or another, and where each woman who has a message to give may give it briefly and forcibly, but not harshly.

"For club growth, if healthy, is surely in the direction of harmony. Harmony is not unison, however, and the modern masters of musical composition have shown us what a wonderful number of different tones may be joined in one harmonious chord. And at our women's clubs we are just learning the same lesson—from a hundred different opinions we make a grand chorus, the effect of which is far more rich and beautiful than if all the voices utter the same word or note. If club growth should be in the direction of discussion free to all, it follows as a natural corollary that there will be an increasing freedom as to the topics chosen for discussion as well as in the treatment of those topics."

Society Women and Their Children.

Do society women neglect their children? How can they help it? If giving them plenty to eat and to wear, if sending them to expensive schools and spending large sums for their accomplishments were all that was required to bring up children, then the answer would be in the negative. But if parents are in duty bound to give more care and supervision than this—to have charge of their moral and intellectual growth—then there are instances upon instances where not only the much abused society woman, but that other large class, not always found in swelldom, but who allow innumerable outside responsibilities to take precedence of home life, do neglect the little ones.

A woman of many engagements boasts that she spends one hour every day with her children, and that this is all she can possibly find time for. What is one hour out of a whole day? There are many families all through the city where children rise in the morning, eat their breakfasts and go off to school without one word from the mother, who is sleeping in a well guarded attempt to make up for the late hours of the night before. There are servants to see that the children are well fed and warmly attired, but such children can never have the sweet memories of home that those have who departed for school with a goodby kiss and a word of interest in the day's lessons. —Brooklyn Eagle.

Helping on Wash Days.

Women are naturally inclined to be helps and not hindrances in the daily routine of home life, but sometimes a very good woman can be very selfish in her choice of duties without meaning it especially. Take, for instance, the Monday's work, when the girl does the washing and the mistress is supposed to do the housework. How much of it does she really accomplish?

To begin with, the girl cooks the breakfast and lays the table. She performs these duties in the interludes of washing. While the family eat breakfast the girl washes and the mistress thereafter assists her by clearing up the breakfast dishes. Pots and pans are crowded away in the sink for Mary to wash when the clothes are out. Then the mistress gets a wretched apology for lunch or dinner and leaves the dishes for Mary, who is nearly through with the washing.

Some time in the afternoon the girl finds time to wash her dishes and prepare the third meal of the day. She has actually performed the duties of two women, but her mistress, lying down with a headache, will declare that she got it doing Mary's work for her. Mary, on her part, if she tells the truth, will say that it tired her more cleaning up after the mistress than her washing did. Every unwashed and misplaced dish was a hindrance.—Detroit Free Press.
