BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

By Thornton W. Burgess

A REAL HOUSE AT LAST
Who in his work takes honest pride, In doing so is justified. —Old Mother Nature.

There is no finer pride than that in honest work well done. Jerry Muskrat and Mrs. Jerry were proud of their new house. They had worked hard to build it. There are not many workers in the Smiling Pool, but Jerry and Mrs. Jerry really are workers. In this respect they are like Paddy the Beaver and Mrs. Paddy. Of course, they are much smaller and they do not do such hard work as the Beaver folk. They do not have to cut trees to get their food. They do not have to build such a big house, nor do they have to build a dam as do the Beaver folk. But they do build a house and it is a lot of work. Peter Rabbit had watched that house grow. First it had been a little island of mud and rushes, looking as if it was mostly mud. This had been dug up from the bottom of the Smiling Pool. When it was just above the level of the water, more and more rushes were cut and piled on it. It rose higher and higher above the water until it looked very much like a sort of haycock made of rushes. Peter turned up his nose at it. There was no door. There was no window. There was no inside. It was nothing but a big pile of mud and rushes.

Then, where Peter couldn't see him, Jerry went to work under water. He began to dig into that pile of mud and rushes. He was digging a passage just big enough for him to use comfortably. When he was tired, Mrs. Jerry took his place.

The passage led up to the middle at the level of the water. There it was not as much digging as biting off the rushes, for there wasn't much mud there. They were making a room there. What they bit off was carried down through the hall they had made, and outside. There they added it to the outside of the pile, to the roof.

After a while, they had a sort of room above the water on the little island of mud. It had a very low roof at first. They kept on piling rushes on the outside, building the roof higher and higher. As they piled the rushes on the outside, they kept cutting away on the inside and so it was the room became larger. Of course, as they continued to pile stuff on the roof, it pressed the roof down and that was one reason they had to keep cutting away inside.

But at long last that snug bedroom suited Mrs. Jerry. She had to have it just so to suit her. She knew what she wanted and she insisted on having it.

When the house was finished, there was still work to be done. There were canals to dig. The water around the house must be deep enough so that Jack Frost could not freeze it clear to the bottom. Should that happen Jerry and Mrs. Jerry would be prisoners in- side and might even starve to

OPPOSE ROYAL VISIT

COLOMBO, Ceylon, (AP) — In- formed sources Thursday said there is strong opposition in Premier Sir John Kotelawala's governing party against inviting the Queen to visit Ceylon next April during her Far Eastern tour. Those ob- jectioning say the visit will cost Cey- lon too much money and create a false impression that the country is prosperous.
