"Who then?" Flaherty asked, pointing a thick finger at her. "Not Frame, Lola. He says he went through the grips at College Boy's hotel, and there was no dough there. And he says that he did his job of work with a gun; but not a word about a bullet wound in the corpse of the dead Englishman, Marchant."

"Here! Lola cried. "What's it all about, Flaherty? You didn't come here, just to tell me that they never got College Boy at all."

"It was you who opened up on College Boy, when I said I was taking a powder," Flaherty defended. "College Boy is nothing to me. But it might be worth your while to be somewhere else, just the same, when this guy Marchant fires the first gun. For he has a story to tell; and Lola, he is going to be believed."

"If I thought that rat was alive still..." Lola cried savagely. "Oh, what does it matter. Listen Flaherty, I came here to be out of the way, if any trouble broke loose. And I felt bad about College Boy..."

"You wouldn't understand, I just went native, to forget the whole thing."

"And how?" Flaherty asked. "I heard something..."

"I danced at a wild party," Lola said. "I felt like that. And Strubinski picked me out to work in a film. He didn't believe me, when I said I had never heard of him. It was something to do, anyhow. And it turned out that I was right for the camera, and my voice was right on the mike, as well. What do you make of that?"

"Your luck comes, just when you aren't looking for it," Flaherty agreed. "When you're asking for a good break, you get the worst one there is. It is always like that. But, from what I hear you are finishing a big picture that cost six hundred grand?"

"And I'm shot all through it," Lola boasted. "On and off the screen, all the time."

"That's just it," Flaherty agreed. "What would happen to that film, if there was a big scandal, with your name smeared on top of it? Sacconi's racket, and the kidnapping of a famous English painter? Where would you get off at?"

"It simply mustn't happen," Lola decided. "There's only one way of preventing it from happening. Flaherty assured her. "You and that coloured maid of yours, must be missing when Marchant starts asking questions. Can't you find some film work over in Europe, that will occupy you for six months or so, until the gale has blown itself out?"

"There might be something in that," Lola agreed. "I'm discussing a new contract, but I can duck, of course. See here, Flaherty, was that bunk about College Boy put in to make me interested in going to Europe?"

"It was you who mentioned College Boy," Flaherty reminded her. "I only took the chance to say that I didn't believe he was dead. I never have, Lola, and that's shooting square with you."

"You got money?" Lola asked. "You oughta have, Flaherty," Flaherty nodded reassuringly.

Elmsdale and Vicinity
