Maritime Conference To Open Here Today

Author of an article entitled "Myths of Juvenile Delinquency" which appeared in a recent issue of The Standard, C. G. Gifford will be one of the leaders of discussion groups at the Maritime Conference on Social Work scheduled to get underway in Charlottetown this evening.

Mr. Gifford is at the present time associate professor of social work at McGill University in charge of the group work sequence.

Holder of the D.F.C. as the result of his services with the R.C.A.F., Mr. Gifford has written professional articles on delinquency and on group work in treatment settings. He has also presented papers at conferences and conducted institutes in Canada and the United States. As part of his professional experience he has directed a Roatry Boys' Camp at Bolton, Ont., and acted as a counselor to the Bathurst Community Club with their project to rehabilitate members of the "Beanyery Gang."

He was also director of group activities at the Norton Psychiatric Clinic, Louisville, Kentucky, for a period between 1950-55.

Foreman To Receive Medal For Saving Lineman's Life

John B. Brown, line foreman with Maritime Electric Company Limited, Charlottetown, will be the first islander to receive the Canadian Electrical Association's Resuscitation Medal.

The award will be made at the C.E.A. Annual Convention in Murray Bay, P.Q., and Mr. Brown left the province this weekend to be on hand to receive the award next Wednesday.

V.A. Ainsworth, former manager of Maritime Electric, and now general manager of Newfoundland Light and Power, will make the presentation as president of the association. Also present from Maritime Electric will be A.D. Cameron, general manager, and R.A. Parker, chief accountant.

Mr. Brown is receiving the award for his prompt action in administering artificial respiration and no doubt saving the life of a fellow-workman in January of this year.

At that time, George L. Carver, Lineman with Maritime Electric, accidentally contacted a 6900 volt rural distribution line at the top of a pole. He was rendered unconsciously immediately and slid down the pole on his pole strap. Mr. Brown applied the Holgar-Nielson method of resuscitation for approximately four minutes when the injured man began to breathe steadily and was able to be rushed to the hospital.

His father was still missing. The wondered too of the seemingly superhuman displays by men like Jack Doucet, who stayed alive for 20 minutes in the chill water and supported his teen-age son although he can't swim. Both were rescued.

They mourned for men like Albert Chiasson, father of 14 children, the youngest six months old. He had a brother missing too.

There was little optimism. But the men — and there were few women in evidence — clung to every hope.

Before Sunday masses at the two Roman Catholic churches in this predominantly French-speaking area, fishermen donned rubber coversalls and jumped into their boats with lunch cans to search for missing men.

They were joined in the search by an RCAF crash boat and helicopter, government planes, fisheries patrol boats and RCMP-led foot patrols who combed the coastline inch by inch.

"I see some fishing nets up on the shore down near the point," said one old-timer, referring to Point Escuminac, four miles from here.

funerals that were to come. At church services Sunday some faces showed the strain of waiting. Crowds attended to pray for the dead and missing.

Wives and children clustered around the wharves waiting for word of loved ones.

Lured by the heaviest salmon run in 10 years, about 50 boats put out Friday night into Northumberland Strait, where they were smashed and scattered by the howling northeaster.

NEVER BEFORE "There never was no loss of life of boats in storms since I started fishing for salmon in 1915," said Walter Bransfield, 55-year-old retired fisherman, whose house became a flood-tide rescue centre Saturday and Sunday.

"It was blowing awful dirty," said 43-year-old Jack Doucet. Bernie Jenkins who took Doucet and his two sons aboard his boat after the Doucet craft capsized, said, "it was the worst storm I have ever seen. Waves rose up like mountains all around us."

Saturday giant waves 50 to 60 feet high still lashed the horse-shoe shaped breakwater here that forms a quiet haven for fishing boats from such adjacent communities as Baie Ste. Anne, Bay du Vin, Hardwicke and Edcumbe.

The fishing was good. "That's how so many boats got caught," said Mr. Bransfield. "It was a pretty poor picture. If it had been poor fishing a lot of boats wouldn't have gone out."

Some got back all right after taking shelter or riding out the storm. Others were still unreported Sunday night. Bits and pieces of wreckage had been washed ashore or towed in by searching fishermen, many of whom had missed drowning by a fluke of nature.

STORIES OF COURAGE Stories of raw-courage were told around boiling pots of coffee in the rescue co-ordination centre. They talked of Fraser Cook of Howard's Cove, P.E.I., who lashed his son to the mast of his boat and then was swept overboard himself. The son was later rescued and admitted to hospital.

Yvon Durelle, British Empire light-heavyweight boxing champion who owns four boats at Baie St. Anne, said: "I came here Friday to go out myself but the weather was too bad. It was blowing hard. The marine weather forecast for Friday night said winds of 30 or 35 miles an hour. They are nothing around here." None of Durelle's boats was out.
