

Helicopters To Supply Troops As Experiment

By BILL BOSE
Canadian Press Staff Writer

IN KOREA, (CP) — Canadian army trucks will pull the roads in the Commonwealth division area today while helicopters take over supplying the division in "Operation Skyhook."

Normally the 55th general transport company of the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps hauls division ammunition, while New Zealand soldiers handle gasoline and lubricants and the British look after rations.

"Operation Skyhook," a three-day exercise, is designed to demonstrate the ability of helicopters to supply beleaguered or isolated forces with materials.

The truck drivers will work as ground crew to load and unload the aircraft. The airlift distance will be about seven miles.

"Operation Skyhook" has been tested previously with two United States Army divisions. This will be a more thorough trial because the Commonwealth division has twice as many vehicles as a U. S. division and uses much more ammunition.

The operation's principal Canadian army co-operator is Maj. H. A. Trimble of Ottawa.

CHAPTER XXI

In the meanwhile, however, and unnoticed by either of the combatants, the uproar had attracted the attention of others — as it could hardly fail to do. The Samoans, who had been left outside and were now peering in through the window in wondering amazement at this elemental battle in which the white men were indulging; while the door leading through to the back of the house had been opened and now framed the scared faces of the two house-boys.

The Samoans had arrived in time to see Strang kneeling on his opponent's body, and at sight of their employer's apparent victory over the man who had laid him out the night before, Teforra's honest heart was filled with joy. When, a few seconds later, however, the tables were completely turned, he gave way to a dismayed ejaculation, and unslinging his rifle made for the open door, intent upon rectifying this unseemly state of affairs. His companion followed suit automatically, and at sight of the two armed men bursting in through the doorway, the house-boys, with one impulse, made a bolt for the back door.

Thurlow had flung himself upon Strang as the latter started to scramble to his feet, and bearing him down upon the floor again, returned his punishment of a few moments before, with interest.

He was in a position to end the fight now with a few well-directed blows, and he had, in fact, smashed home a right to Strang's jaw, which just missed the point, when Fate, in the unpossessing shape of Teforra, dashed the chances of victory from him.

Something crashed into the back of his skull with a force that gave him a momentary impression that the roof of the house had fallen on him; and then, as he raised his dazed head blindly, a second blow thudded home and consciousness was eclipsed under a black avalanche of night.

When next he became aware of his surroundings he found that he was lying on his face on the floor with somebody tying his wrists behind his back.

He lay supine, only half-conscious of the fact that life was beginning to mean something to him again, and even when rough hands turned him over on to his back, and hoisted him to his bound feet, his head still sagged forward helplessly and the lamp-lit floor shimmered dizzily before his dazed eyes.

His legs were utterly incapable of supporting his body, and but for the unseen hands which held him on either side, he would have slipped down into a heap.

He was jerked backwards and fell into a chair, and then for the first time he became aware of a babel of voices around him. His head felt about the size of a balloon — a balloon that was one cast ache — and as his scattered senses began to return to him, he had a dim idea that some appalling natural catastrophe had taken place of which he was the principal victim.

When at last he contrived to lift his head and look about him, it began to dawn on him that his period of consciousness could not have lasted more than a few minutes at the outside, and was definitely due to human agency — though he was in no fit state to estimate even approximately what had caused his downfall.

The first thing he saw was that the room had suffered considerably in the course of the battle. The gramophone had been wrecked completely, for the sound-box and turn-table were lying among a heap of shattered records which had been thrown out of the cupboard below. The table had been overturned and the crockery and glasses smashed, while the contents of a broken whisky bottle lay in a pool on the coral floor.

The trader, who was standing facing him, looked decidedly the worse for wear, for in addition to his dishevelled clothing and topped hair there was a lump on his jaw the size of a hen's egg and one of his eyes was almost closed and already showing purple. He was holding a bloodstained handkerchief to his nose and glaring balefully at his late opponent with his one good eye. There were four Samoans in the room now, and one of the house-boys had returned and was standing gazing fearfully at the scene from the open door at the back.

Strang, who had been giving vent to his feelings by cursing everyone in general, addressed himself in particular to Thurlow as soon as the latter's wandering gaze showed him to be conscious of his surroundings.

"Oh, you've come to life again, have you, curse you!" he rasped. "Well, you'll be sorry Teforra did not pass you out altogether before I'm through with you! I'm going to teach you and all the rest of the scum here that nobody can get away with bucking me!"

Thurlow made no reply. He was only just beginning to piece things together in his brain, and the trader's words held no particular meaning for him at the moment.

She said in an interview a first-class high school teacher earns about 3,600 guilders a year in Dutch Guiana. Although the guilder is worth only half as much as the Canadian dollar in the foreign exchange market, it has the same purchasing power at home as the dollar in Canada.
