ELLEN'S DIARY

Long Fingers Of Sunlight Catch The Autumn Hues

We ribboned our loaves with sunshine this morning, tying them with its bright streamers before setting him aside to rise. And came then to a door to watch the warming beams reach into the valley. Long fingers of light caught the autumn's hues, scattered so beautifully on woodland and field. They caressed the herd against a far hillside of pasture, and loved the little flock of ewes and lambs, most attractive now in their clean fleecy coats, nibbling in the meadow by the lane.

"What do you plan to do?" Alex questioned from a verandah.

"Well, firstly" we said "we had better heap the woodbox! There's bread to bake and..."

"...cookies" he suggested.

And Scample, the dog, whom James declares is "as knowing as a human", seated beside the lad, listening in to our conversation, suddenly turned away to the yard to lunch on a bite of grass.

"Yes, we had better get wood to the box" we said, "because it seems as though this sunshine isn't going to last through the day!"

"What's the night like?" James, come in now from the out of doors, repeats our question without enthusiasm. "It's raining again" he says quietly.

Yet the night is not without its encouragement for the folkst of this farm.

"There's a new litter arriving now in the piggery" he reports. "It's good we had the sty clean and bedded, and things all snug for them there."

In the interval of waiting for conditions favorable to take up the threshing again, which, of course, must await dry sheaves, our farmers tidy and repair the barns and stables in preparation for the coming of the winty days. Today, shingles lost before this to a high wind, were replaced on the heights of a building, and other ends of like repairs were effected about.

And all the time, riding on the sunny wind, leaves left their branches to drift down to lie in restless little heaps on the lawn below. There the kittens frolicked this afternoon, as happily as so many children, lost in their play.

Mack is our visitor at the moment. On the couch he smiles at some amusing incident in the book he reads. For while not nearly the bookworm that Granddaughter is, he nevertheless reads considerably now. He looks up hearing the rain beat down on a roof.

"It's a good thing that calf of mine is not out in this" he says to James in the armchair close by "Did you see him today?" he inquires. "Growing well, isn't he? Filling out nicely. Got a deep thick body — good legs too and feet. Got a strong back. And a short neck and..."

"...a good head" James nods. "Yes, what you'd call "a masculine head."

"Funny aren't they?" the Curiosity-cat beside Mack grins at us. "With them it's all calves and cows, and the things of the farming! I wager neither of them heard that mousetrap, behind the door, snap."

The rises and steps down smartly.

"Come" his cat's eyes shine with anticipation "I have a feeling, we, you and I should see to that right away!"

Until tomorrow — — Diary— Good-night.....

On achievement day, Miss Theresa MacLeod, director of Prince Edward Island Women's Institutes, was present to see all the work accomplished by the ladies in dressmaking and handicrafts. She was welcomed by Mrs. J.P. MacAuley, and Miss LeClair introduced each lady and gave an interesting citation as each one modeled or showed her achievements.

Mrs. Mary Pierce thanked Miss MacLeod for her kind remarks and also Miss LeClair and Miss Theriault for their kind assistance and said how much the class had enjoyed the work which also had a sketch of fun mixed with it.

Gifts were presented to the Instructresses by little Miss Anne MacAuley on behalf of the ladies taking the course. They fittingly replied.

Singing "The Queen" was followed by a delicious lunch being served by the members. This brought a very enjoyable two weeks to a close.
