of those of the name who had forgotten this evening in the kitchen. Night was commencing to draw dark curtains then, presumably, as it happened, bringing to a close a day of rain. No evening star glimmered. There was no sign of moonrise.

Enclosed and misty it still was, though for the call that conditions had improved since the afternoon. As Alex had pointed out then with a sigh of relief when the showers had become more infrequent, "We should be happy now that the worst of the fresh in the stream is over and that the bridge in the lane took care of it so well."

"Yes, and with most of the snow now washed away, it's not likely that we will have any more freshets to worry us this spring," we said. "And last night's snow, though it came in, doubling in connection with reports heard of flood waters in other Provinces and places, that when they built these buildings, they set them well above the stream here against the hills!"

"Now, when you think of it," Mack remarked, "that's something we can't be sure of. It just could be that the call that came this morning will top her class at the Fair! See what I mean?"

James smiled. "I agree. There was nothing extra - ordinary, but what do you most remember of it now?" we questioned.

"Everything, Ellen," he grinned. "It was good!"

"And you?" we asked Mack. "I'd say, its highlight was trying out that new baseball mitt, between showers at noon. And was it neat!" he smiled.

Alex, momentarily lost to the flicker of firelight, looked up soberly. "I can't think of any one thing," he said. "Only that it rained, and the stream was
