CAPTAIN LOCHIEL;

—OR—
The Maid of the Mountain.

—BY COLONEL PRENTISS INGRAHAM.

A Scotch lad of blue blood had disappeared mysteriously from his home in the Highlands, and not a trace of him could be found.

His home was thus made desolate, for he was a handsome youth of seventeen, and his equal as a huntsman, horseman, and daring mountaineer could not be found.

It was supposed that he had fallen from some lofty crag and been dashed to death; but a search of the glens and tarns did not discover his body, and so his fate remained a mystery.

Several years after, a young man was wending his way on foot through the mountains of Scotland, and stopped at a wayside inn for a glass of ale and a bite to regale himself with.

There were in the inn half-a-dozen Highlanders, two of whom started at seeing the young man, and immediately went out together.

"It's the laddie!" said one.

"Yes, McDonald, it is, and no mistake."

"Then Donald played us false?"

"True, he did."

"And he is going home to the castle, and all will not be well with us."

"No."

"We must take care of ourselves."

"Yes, you say well."

"We will walk on ahead and drop him at the pass, and the stream will carry his body away!"

"Yes."

And the two walked on together, disappearing up the glen, while a moment after the young man came out of the inn and followed the same path.

As he did so a young girl arose from where she had been reclining, book in hand, on the other side of a large tree, and followed him.

She had heard all that the two men had said, and as the young man got out of sight of the inn she overtook him.

"I beg pardon, sir, but are you Master Lochiel, of Castle Craig?"

"I am, Missy," was the polite reply, as the young man beheld before him a beautiful girl of sixteen.

"You disappeared from home mysteriously some six years ago, as I remember hearing of it."

"Yes, I was taken at disadvantage by two men, dragged to the sea-cliffs, and thrown into the sea. But I was a good swimmer, and after holding up for nine hours was picked up by an American craft, and carried to foreign parts."

"I wrote home, but got no replies, and after some years of wandering and hard knocks, I am back home again."

"And the two men who attempted to kill you, were both in the inn, recognized you, and are now lying in wait to murder you, for I overheard their plot!"

"God bless you, my sweet girl. But are you not Aileen Garton, the daughter of the inn-keeper?"

"Yes, sir."

"I remember you now, sweet Aileen; but you have grown from a mere girl almost to womanhood, and I thank you for the service done me, and will give those fellows a hot reception."

"You will not get that way, sir, surely?"

"Ah, yes, for I am warmed and armed, too!"

"We will meet again, Missy Aileen, the few hours I am at home."

Soon after two shots rang out in the pass, and timely approaching the spot, Aileen beheld the two plotters dead in the path, while the young man was nowhere to be seen.

Hastening back to the inn she told her father what had happened, and at once the country ranger with the news of the return of the young master of Castle Craig and his having killed the two men who had attempted to murder him in the past.

During his absence from home the father of young Lochiel had died, and his young son, by a second wife, was the acknowledged heir to the estates, but there were ugly rumors abroad that Lochiel's step-mother had forced her husband to plot the life of his eldest son, that he might be the heir; but of this the young master of Castle Craig said nothing, and after few months at home again departed upon his travels.

But during his stay at Castle Craig he had almost daily met pretty Aileen Garton in his ramblings.

The people called her the "Maid of the Mountains," as she was almost sure to be found hunting, fishing, or gathering wild flowers among the glens and on the mountain sides.

And in those meetings the young master of Castle Craig had learned to love the beautiful girl who had saved his life, as he well knew, by putting him upon his guard against the assassins.

And Aileen fairly idolized the handsome young Scot, so that when he went away on his travels, she had pledged him to one day be his wife.

A few moments after the departure of the young Scot, news came that a gallant young Highlander, who had enlisted as a private soldier, had risen from the ranks by his superb courage, and that the famous "Captain Lochiel," as he was called, was none other than the master of Castle Craig.

He had gone into a Scotch regiment stationed in Canada, after his escape from death by being picked up by an American craft, and hiding his identity, had been willing to work his way up.

His regiment was soon ordered to Eastern lands, and there his courage in battle soon won him fame, and at last the secret came out, and Aileen Garton rejoiced at the fame won by her lover.

A year after his second departure Captain Lochiel again returned to Castle Craig.

He was met in London by his step-mother and half-brother, a youth of sixteen, and a young lady of great beauty, a kinswoman of Mrs. Lochiel, who was going to spend a few months at Castle Craig.

Days passed by after the return of Captain Lochiel, and Aileen's heart was full of sorrow, for he had not come near her, nor had she been able to meet him, as before, in the mountains.

And more still, rumor had it that the gallant captain was to marry Miss Vere Underhill, the lady guest at Castle Craig.

One day Captain Lochiel was walking in the words with Miss Underhill.

She was a very beautiful girl, very fascina-ing, and, with her, dressed in his uniform, they made a very handsome couple.

The words were on the lips of Captain Lochiel to ask Miss Underhill to be his wife, when he heard a rustling sound, and there, within three feet of him, he beheld the "Maid of the Mountains."

She was as white as the dress she wore, and leaning against a large tree as if for support; he saw that her face was pale and haggard.

"Aileen! You
