Viruses Seen Cancer Cause

LONDON (AP) — The British Medical Research Council reported evidence Tuesday that viruses found naturally in the human system are a potential cause of cancer.

The council also reported hope in developing a method of testing for cancer potential of viruses without trying them on human guinea pigs.

The government - sponsored council is one of the leading cancer research agencies in Britain.

Its report said it had been known for years that viruses induce cancers in chickens but it had not been accepted that they could cause cancer in mammals.

In recent years, however," the report said, "the concept of viral neoplasia (disorganized or abnormal growth) has received a stimulus from the discovery of the whole range of viruses that produce leukemia and a variety of tumors in mice and hamsters."

Two viruses that occur naturally in man — adenoviruses Types 12 and 18—have been shown to cause tumors in hamsters, the report said.

GOOD EVIDENCE

"Advenoviruses are a group which are common inhabitants of the human nasopharynx (passage between nose and mouth) and there is good evidence that many individuals have been infected at least with Type 12.

"There is thus for the first time evidence that humans are naturally infected with viruses potentially capable of causing malignant tumors. . . .

"To inoculate human beings in order to achieve the final experimental proof that any agent will cause tumors in man is clearly unthinkable.

"But as a result of recent developments there now is some hope of testing the potentiality of a virus to cause tumors in humans by examining its effect on human cells in culture rather than by recourse to heroic expedients."

The bidding:

East	South	West	North
Pass	Pass	1♠	Dble.
2♦	2♠	3♦	4♦

Vulnerability frequently has an effect on the bidding of a hand. For example, look at this deal where the bidding went as shown and South became declarer at four spades after North had bid the game.

It is hardly likely that West would have thrown in the sponge so soon if the vulnerability had been reversed. From his viewpoint, four spades seemed highly likely to be made — especially after East had shown weakness by bidding two diamonds over the double — and five diamonds, not vulnerable, could not be hurt much.

But since East - West were vulnerable and North - South were not, West adopted the more conservative course of passing four spades. This turned out to be a good decision on several counts, since he would probably have gone down at five diamonds and it turned out that South went down at four spades.

West based his pass in part on the hope that the line of defense he had decided to adopt would defeat the contract. He realized that his side could scarcely expect to take four high - card tricks against the four spade contract, so, backing his judgment, he selected as his opening lead the three of diamonds!

East won the trick unexpectedly with the ten and quickly realized that West had underled the A-K-Q in order to obtain a ruff in some suit. From the appearance of dummy's hand and his own, he naturally concluded that West was void of hearts, and he therefore returned a heart. (It was hard for East to realize that declarer had all six missing clubs.)

South won the heart with the queen, West following suit (to East's surprise), and led a spade. West played low and East took the queen with the ace. It was clear by now that West's void had to be in clubs, so East returned a club which West ruffed. Declarer later lost a spade to the king and the outcome was that South went down one as a result of the lively defense.
