

Dr. Adams To Stand Trial, Is Cheered By Old Ladies

By EDDY GILMORE
EASTBOURNE, Eng. (AP) — Dr. John Bodkin Adams left here Thursday to stand trial for murder. He went away with cheers ringing in his ears.

After 44 witnesses testified over an 11-day span that the Irish-born doctor killed his patients for profit he was cheered in court by some of the old ladies he used to treat.

"Stand up," said court clerk Harry Odell at the close of a preliminary hearing on a charge the 50-year-old "old lady" doctor murdered Mrs. Edith Morrell, a rich widow and patient of his.

The 60-year-old doctor got to his feet. His huge fat hands trembled as he gripped the oak rail of the prisoner's dock.

"Have you anything to say?" asked the Chief Magistrate, David Honeysell, a bass-voiced innkeeper.

"I am not guilty," said Adams in his voice breaking into soprano on the words "I am not guilty."

OLD LADIES CHORUSED

"Hear, hear," chorused two grey-haired women in the packed courtroom. Later they said they were patients of the accused physician.

The moon-faced doctor beamed with pleasure and his shaking became less noticeable.

"I reserve my defence," he added.

The clerk handed him the official accusation to sign. Dr. Adams had trouble writing his name, when he finished it was little better than a scrawl.

His face was flushed scarlet as he left the dock. Above his cell, a harvest moon rising over a white-washed fence.

COURT ROOM PACKED

His blue watery eyes roamed over the spectators packed into the court room. Ninety per cent of them were women who looked to be over 50.

"Good evening," said the doctor as he descended the 13 steps leading to his cell.

Thirty minutes later he was on his way to Brixton Prison in London in the back of a police limousine. Dr. Adams is expected to go on trial in London's Old Bailey Court in February.

"Good bye, doctor, good bye," shouted a group of women outside the police station.

Dr. Adams waved to them through the glass of the car.

As the evidence-taking ended, defence counsel Geoffrey Lawrence pleaded with the magistrates—three men and two women.

to set Dr. Adams free.

He said the prosecution made out no real case and hinted that Scotland Yard's Detective Superintendent Herbert Hannam faked evidence against the physician.

NO WITNESS PRESENT

Lawrence made much of the point that some of Dr. Adams' reported confessions to drugging Mrs. Morrell were made to the detective when no witnesses were present.

Defence counsel made plain that Dr. Adams—if he enters the witness box at his trial—will deny the detective's charge that he told them he gave Mrs. Morrell "massive doses" of morphine and heroin.

Scotland Yard blamed Adams for killing three of his patients to reap rewards from their wills. Testimony was given that he received two Rolls Royce cars and a chest of silver among other things.

In summing up for the defence, Lawrence hinted that when the case goes to trial next month he may make a strong plea to reduce the murder charge to manslaughter.
