A Cable Interview

BETWEEN MR. NORMAN AT VANCOUVER AND MR. STEAD AT LONDON—THE "PALL MALL GAZETTE'S" EDITORIAL ON MIDNIGHT TALK ACROSS THE WORLD.

The three hours' cable interview between Mr. Norman at Vancouver and Mr. Stead in London is the talk of the clubs. Mr. Stead writes hopefully of the great object lesson this midnight talk across the world affords. He says it is striking symbol, imperial unity and prophetic of closer union. There is no danger that Great Britain will attempt to draw the imperial tie too tightly. The ultimate tie between the English-speaking people is likely to be an alliance for mutual assistance against foreign foes and the creation of a permanent tribunal to arbitrate and conciliate.

"The shrinkage of the world under electricity, which is the most notable phenomenon of our century, has seldom been more remarkably illustrated than by the interview which took place last night between the editor of this journal and our special commissioner. Mr. Norman has at last found his way across the American continent and on the eve of his departure for Japan, standing on the shore of the Pacific, he paused to hold an hour's conversation with his chief at a distance of over seven thousand miles. This interviewing tour around the world, in the course of which our representative has interviewed almost every colonial personage of note in the Dominion, from the Governor General to the Mayor of Vancouver, has now yielded the most extraordinary interview on record. Never before has modern journalism made so bold a use of the instruments which science has placed at its disposal. Between our special and his chief stretched an expanse of sea and land across which, thirty years ago, would have been impossible to exchange a communication in less than from three four months, but thanks to the enterprise and energy of cable layers and railroad builders in the last few years it is possible to hold a confidential conversation between London and Vancouver without a greater interval than four minutes between an answer and a reply.

FOUR MINUTES INSTEAD OF FOUR MONTHS!

That measures the shrinkage of the plastic world beneath the magic touch of the electrical engineer. None of the wonders of the Arabian Nights can outdo the marvel of that midnight talk across the cable, in which a question framed on the banks of the Thames was answered on the banks of the Fraser river within a couple of minutes. In four minutes a circuit of 15,000 miles is complete. London can talk to Vancouver with no more delay than if the telegraph were not, the Horse Guards can talk to the War Office. The night was unpropitious, a storm raging in the far away western regions between Winnipeg and the Rocky mountains. There was interrupted conversation for nearly an hour, but although the temperature was below zero the damage was promptly repaired, the interrupted sentence was completed and the interview proceeded to its close as though no blizzards had swept across the Northwest, and the wire instead of traversing the ocean depths and mountain heights had merely connected Hampstead and Wimbledon. This is an object lesson of the first importance, for it teaches the world that distance has disappeared so far as transmission of ideas is concerned, and as the government of men, especially representative government of men, tends to become more and more a matter of ideas, it is impossible to overestimate the political significance of the revolution thus effected. As our commissioner remarked last night, the slender filament of metal along which last night crossed and recrossed the messages of sympathy and requests for directions, is itself a striking symbol of our imperial unity, and prophetic of that closer union there is still to be between our island realm and her auxiliary kingdoms. Regarded as a chain what can be weaker? The trailing anchor of a storm driven vessel might snap the cable at either end, a gust of wind might bring the overhead wires to the ground, a prowling bear from the forest primeval clambering up the poles might interrupt the circuit. As a material it is as slender as the gossamer, and yet what chain of fortresses, what Roman wall of frowning masonry could vie for a moment in real potency as an Empire binder with this silent and secret highway of the thoughts of man. It makes neighbors of dewellers at the uttermost ends of the earth. The change cannot fail to impress the imagination of statesmen and fill the hearts of our people with fresh hope as to the promise of the future. Our correspondent is evidently impressed with the danger of attempting to draw too tightly the imperial tie. Fortunately we need be under no apprehension on that score. England, after the next general election, will give Home Rule to Ireland. She is not likely to accompany that wise step in the direction of judicious decentralization at her own doors by an endeavor to move in the other direction in her relations with the Dominion. The ultimate tie between the English speaking commonwealths seems likely to be an alliance for mutual assistance against foreign foes, and a permanent tribunal of conciliation to which all questions at issue between the allies will be referred. For the rest we must look to born of the common interests and of a common tongue of the peoples now dwelling within earshot of each other, even though their habitations may be in the valley of the Saskatchewan or on the banks of the Clyde. The reception accorded to our commissioner in every province of the Dominion, the hospitality he has experienced and the cordial assistance rendered him in the attempt now being made to familiarize the old world with the thoughts, sentiments and aspirations of Canadians are all tokens of the existence of a community of feeling and a consciousness of our unity, which cannot fail to be enormously strengthened by every fresh manifestation of the fact that distance has disappeared and space no longer intervenes as a barrier between the ocean-sundered members of the Imperial family.
