ELLEN'S DIARY

Oven Roasted Wild Duck Is Finger-Lickin' Fare

"Given another good day, or two, we should see the last of our grain all gathered in" one of the farmers of the name, reported this evening — The season hurried farm-folks on with their work today, by way of drifting leaves, and a raven's rusty call, the same we hear through the fall and winter days

All in all, this was a busy week. There is no time to be idled away on farms these days, with the piper of Autumn playing his tune. No seeking of fresh interests just "to pass the time away."

Grain, mangels, potatoes, turnips — apples, vegetables off the garden-plot, what harvestings are now being done, so that no part of the crop will be lost, wasted on the fields, but all safely gathered in.

Today with company dropping by to join us, we enjoyed the roast of wild ducks, a toothsome and savory fare.

"Better, I'd day" James, himself by nature, no hunter, commented with a teasing twinkle when the gifts came to this house, presented by a pair of grandsons," to save the price of your ammunition, and buy yourselves a nice roast of beef. You'd be in pocket, don't you think?"

"But, Man" Gage replied "think of all the excitement a fellow would then miss! The early rising — the freshness of the morning air. And the stillness. And the silence, as you wait for them to come in, when all you hear is your own heart-beat! And all of a sudden, there is that old sound of wings —like a wind rising. And there they are! Yes, morning or afternoon or any time, it's good. It's 'Bang! Bang!' And" he chuckled "then you wish you had a high priced retriever to bring 'em in, instead of just a little innocent old hound dog, content to wait for you in the truck!"

"And the harvest not done yet" James commented. "And more than that not even one furrow of the plowing turned!"

"It will be done — all of it before the snow blows across the fields. You just wait and see" Gage smiled.

The Hunters' season: cool silent mornings, golden afternoons. Beat of wings, drift of wildlings — falling leaf, tawny fields. And little winds of day presently keening over the trails they choose.

"We should keep an eye out now for our Christmas tree" one of the youngsters offered today. "Just" he added "so we will know where to find one when we want it — to have that much settled, you see."

"Yes" another agreed. "Because then you stop to think of it, Christmas is now not months, but only so many weeks away."

However this was an October day. One of quiet winds, with glimpses of the sun through the cloud-cover which came down to meet the hills.

"Hear the rain, Ellen?" James says, from the old armchair. "Yes" he nods, "it was brewing all day."

So we have rain and night now against the windows. And after its joys and disappointments, its delights and concerns, the peace and quiet of the weekends. And what now should we do before we write "The End" to its ways One reminds us that not only at Christ's close, but at the end of every day, we should — but here are his lines:

"When night comes, list thy deeds; make plain the way
'Twixt heaven and earth; block it not with delays;
But perfect all before thou sleep'st: then say:
'There's one more sun strung on my bead of days!'
What's good, score up for joy;
the bad, well scanned,
Wash off with tears — and get thy Master's Hand."

Until Monday — — Diary — Good-night.....
