LITERARY NOTES.

WHAT MR. WILLIAM WATSON SAYS OF HARDY'S GREAT NOVEL, "TESS."

The True Story of Eugene Aram—Count Tolstoi's Opinion of the Productions of the Poets.

Mr. Watson's occasional comments—his "obiter dicta," as Mr. Birrell would call them—are often very felicitous; while most of his judgments rest on a basis of sound common sense. His paper on "The Lancashire Laureate"—i.e., the late Edwin Waugh, a writer of poems in the Lancashire dialect—will hardly attract much interest in America; yet it is one of the best in his book. Of Mr. Hardy's "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" he says:

The great theme of the book is the incessant penalty paid by the innocent for the wicked, the unsuspicious for the crafty, the child for its father; and again and again this spectacle, in its wide diffusion, provokes the novelist to a scarcely suppressed declaration of rebellion against a supramundane ordinance that can decree, or permit, the triumph of such wrong. The book may almost be said to revolve itself into a direct arraignment of the morality of this system of vicarious pain—a morality which, as he bitterly expresses it, "may be good enough for divinities," but is "scorned by average human nature." In one way and another this implicit protest against what he cannot but conceive to be the maladministration of the laws of existence, this expostulation with "whatever gods there be" upon the ethics of their rule, is the burden of the whole strain, and a joyless strain it is, whose theme is the havoc wrought by "those creeds which futilely attempt to check what wisdom would be content to regulate"; the warfare of two ardent hearts against one poor little conscience," wherein the conscience at last is calamitously victorious, the hearts rent and ruined, and over all like an enveloping cloud, "the dust and ashes of things, the cruelty of lust, and the fragility of love." Truly a stupendous argument; and in virtue of the almost intolerable power with which this argument is wrought out, "Tess" must take its place among the great tragedies, to have read which is to have permanently enlarged the boundaries of one's intellectual and emotional experience.

Eugene Aram.

A curious part was played by a skeleton in the tragedy of Eugene Aram—famous in poetry, romance and melodrama, and equally famous in real life. For Eugene Aram, as every one may not remember, was no mere character of fiction. He was the son of a poor gardener in Yorkshire, with aspirations beyond his station. He mastered several languages, and became a schoolteacher in Knaresborough. Here he formed an intimate acquaintance with Daniel Clarke, a shoemaker, who mysteriously disappeared in 1745 after purchasing a lot of valuable goods on credit. Suspicion fell upon Aram, not as Clarke's murderer, but as his confederate in swindling. A portion of the goods were, in fact, dug up in Aram's yard. He was arrested, but the evidence was insufficient to convict him. He then left Knaresborough and traveled through England, collecting materials for a great etymological work—a "Comparative Lexicon of the English, Latin, Greek, Hebrew and Celtic Languages."

In 1759, fourteen years after the disappearance of David Clarke, a skeleton was dug up near Knaresborough. The old story was revived with a new meaning thrust into it. Clarke had not decamped; he had been murdered. This was his body. What strengthened the theory was that Mrs. Aram had frequently been heard to make mysterious statements that her husband and a man named Houseman knew more of Clarke's disappearance than they chose to admit. Housemen was confronted with a bone from the skeleton. He emphatically denied that it was Clarke's. The very emphasis of his denial only increased the public suspicion. How could he be so positive about the identity of a bone? At last Houseman, harried with questions, broke down. He confessed that he had been present at the murder of Clarke by Eugene Aram. He had been so positive about the skeleton's bone because he knew where the real skeleton was buried. He indicated the place, the skeleton was dug up, and Aram was arrested in Norfolk, tried, and, in spite of his own elaborate and ingenious defence, convicted. He confessed his guilt after condemnation. The night before the execution he composed a short poem in defence of suicide, opened a vein, and had nearly bled to death when he was discovered. An immense crowd attended his execution. The picturesque details of the case, united to the scholary attributes of the murderer, attracted immense attention, and the contemporary interest has been perpetuated by the genius of Bulwer, Thomas Hood and Henry Irving.

Tolstoi's Opinion of Poetry.

Count Leo Tolstoi has received in Moscow a visit from an aspiring young Russian poet, who had previously sent a copy of his productions to the great romancist and philosopher. At this interview the Count said: "I have read your book, or at least the greater part of it. But I must tell you at once, and frankly, that I entertain a general dislike to all poetry, and for this reason—that it prevents one from giving a clear, intelligent, and comprehensive expression to one's thoughts and ideas. Why should we laboriously strain to conform our expression to the rhythmical and metrical rules of verification, when we can the better and more clearly convey our thoughts in simple and lucid prose? It is as if, instead of permitting me the free use of my hands, you tether my legs, and make me hobble round the object of observation. In order to be succinct, concise, and comprehensively expressive I always strive so to construct my language that every reader, even he of the scantiest intelligence, can, without the slightest trouble or reflection, at once grasp my meaning. If I wrote in verse my primary and distracting labor would be to conform to the laws and rules of verification, and my readers would be left to sift out for themselves the thoughts and ideas I wished to convey. If I may be perfectly frank with you," said the Count, with a peculiarly bitter expression on his face, "I would say that verses are generally the production of literary wantonness, literary frivolity, and literary insolence."

Found a Rich Gold Mine.

LOWER JORDON BAY, N. S., July 3.—Mr. Samuel Locke, of this place, has just discovered a gold mine here that pans out 100 per cent. of pure metal to the ton. It was a rich vein of sound health to which he was restored, by the use of Dodd's kidney pills, and which he would not exchange for any other mine in America. All last winter he suffered from kidney trouble which would not yield to the prescriptions of several doctors. A few months ago Mr. Locke heard of the good work done by Dodd's kidney pills and tried them with the invariable result. To-day he is well and thinks no praise too great for this wonderful remedy. His neighbors are much interested in what they describe as a marvelous cure.

SOME OF EDISON'S PROBLEMS

Extracting Iron Commercially, the Power of Coal—What Took the Breeze.

"I have long been satisfied," said Mr. Edison, referring to his uncompleted plans for the future, "that it was possible to invent an ore-concentrator, which would vastly simplify the prevailing methods of extracting iron from earth and rock, and which would do it so much cheaper than those processes as to command the market. Of course, I refer to magnetic iron-ore. . . . I worked very hard on this problem and in one sense successfully, for I have been able by my methods to extract this magnetic ore at comparatively small cost, and deliver from my mills pure iron bricklets. . . . I had some ten important details to master before I could get a perfect machine, and I have already mastered eight of them.

"As soon as the ore concentrating business is developed and can take care of itself, I think I shall turn my attention to one of the greatest problems that I have ever thought of solving, and that is, the direct control of the energy which is stored up in coal, so that it may be employed without waste, and at a very small margin of cost. Ninety per cent. of the energy that exists in coal is now lost in converting it into power. . . . Now, that is an awful waste, and even a child can see that if this wastage can be saved it will result in vastly cheapening the cost of everything which is manufactured by electric or steam power. In fact, it will vastly cheapen the cost of all the necessaries and luxuries of life, and I suppose the results will be of mightier influence upon civilization than the development of the steam-engine and electricity have been. It will in fact do away with steam-engines and boilers, and make the use of steam-power as much of a tradition as the stage coach now is."

Mr. Edison looks further ahead than this campaign, for he said: "I think it quite likely that I may try to develop a plan for marine-signaling. . . . I should use the well-known principle that water is a more perfect medium for carrying vibrations than air, and would develope instruments which may be carried upon sea-going vessels, by which they can transmit or receive, through an international code of signals, reports within a radius of say ten miles."

Mr. Edison believes that Chicago is to become the London of America early in the next century, while New York will be its Liverpool, and he is of opinion that very likely a ship-canal may connect Chicago with tide-water, so that it will itself become a great seaport.

Commenting on the above, cotemporary remarks: "It is a great pity that the main benefits of these wonderful improvements will not go to the industrious people whose hands and brains put them into operation. The main benefits will go to increase the already enormous wealth of those persons who own valuable city lands and other similar monopolies.

"This effect will be produced because all these great inventions tend to make labor more productive; but as labor cannot exert itself without access to the natural riches of the earth, and as these are monopolized by private owners, the latter will not allow labor to utilize these natural riches unless labor gives up the greater part of the increased product, by low wages, etc.; thereby increasing the 'economic rent,' which goes into the pockets of the do-nothing land-owner in an ever-increasing stream.

"Thus the poor are growing proportionately poorer; and the monopolist rich are growing richer—fed by the productive labor of the poor, for which they give no service in return. The process is largely an indirect one, thus its operations are not popularly understood.

"Is there no way by which this 'economic rent' can be made to go for the benefit of the whole people, by whose exertions it is really caused to exist?"

Odd Facts and Figures.

The word "girl" occurs but once in the Bible.

Over 3000 women are employed in the railway offices of Austria.

8,000,000,000 letters are estimated to go through the world's postoffices in one year.

The cost of a full-dress uniform of an English Cabinet Minister is about $750.

An Italian who lately committed suicide at Santa Rosa, California, left a statement to the effect that he had no education, and that a man without one had no business to live.

For the first time in the history of Belgium, it is said, the principle of a monetary compensation for breach of promise of marriage has just been established.

There are several dozen men in London who earn their living by catching rats. They are mostly employed at hotels, clubs and restaurants.

Holdfast is a Good Dog.

The Hollanders have waged war with the Atchinese ever since 1873, yet it has been impossible to subjugate them. Had they been united under one Government, Holland would have long since established a strong administration. But it is simply a guerre d l'outrance between every single Atchinese and the Hollanders. Still, the latter cannot give up the country, even if they desired to do so, because their prestige in the Indies would be affected by such a course. The country will, however, pay in the end for the trouble and expense which the conquest entails.

Odd Jots.

The largest cut stones in the world are in the Temple of the Sun of Baalbec. Many are more than sixty feet long, 20 feet broad and of unknown depths.

An English watchmaker exhibits an engine of 122 distinct pieces (not including 33 bolts and screws), which could be hidden by a lady's thimble.

"Devil's Mountain," north of Montreal, known to geologists as the "Trembling Mountain," is gradually sinking into the earth's crust, the "trembling," "quaking," "groans" and "noises" reported being the result.

Marie Antoinette's Crucifix.

A French morning journal has affirmed that the ivory crucifix employed in her devotions by Marie Antoinette during her detention at the Conciergerie had been considerably mutilated by British tourists chipping off pieces to carry away as souvenirs. That assertion, the Standard's Paris correspondent says, is quite false, as the crucifix is fortunately intact; but the Director of the Conciergerie had it receatly placed under a glass bell to prevent the possibility of any daring thief among the visitors one day carrying off the relic.

Parties using the telephone would find talking much more satisfactory if they would observe the following rules:—

1st. Speak with the mouth about four inches from the transmitter.

3rd. Place the telephone so as to cover the ear just as if you wished to shut out all other sounds. Do not press too hard on the ear.

It is possible to talk and be heard when standing back two or three feet from the transmitter, if you shout loud enough, but it is not a pleasant mode of conversation, is entirely unnecessary, and is a useless waste of wind and lungs, besides being very annoying to all within range of your voice.
