THE JADE GOD

Continued from page 2 grinning up at her. She felt like snatching it off again, then she laughed at herself. "Uncle can lend it to me for an hour anyway," she thought, and glancing again at the clock, forgot it. Mark was coming! Her heart was beating; in spite of herself she felt a tremor of uneasiness. She tried to thrust out disturbing thoughts, but old Foadick's manner, his treatment of the man, had been so—so disconcerting! She was a little disturbed still though her eyes were shining when there was a stir in the hall, the lifting of a portiere, a new voice, and then the tall man with the level eyes. She held out a frank hand. "I'm so glad you could come!" she said; "I thought it might be hard for you to find the time." He took her hand and held it, looking down into her eyes. "It's been a thousand times harder to stay away," he replied simply, "and I've tried—I never meant to come here again!" She gave him a questioning look; the firelight caught her face and showed it pale. "I don't know what you mean, but you'll tell me?" she breathed softly. "I came to tell you." "Sit down then, let me give you a cup of tea," her voice faltered. She moved to her place behind the table, trying to hide her eyes from him. "No!" he said quickly. Suddenly, impulsively, she put her hand out and touched his arm. "It can't be as bad as that—and I'm your friend!" she assured him sweetly. He caught her hand and kissed it passionately; then he let it drop and folded his arms. "I'm not fit to do that," he said harshly. "I've played a part around at her and saw the small pale oval of her face, her dark hair and her red lips. She seemed almost a child—he wanted to take her in his arms. But, sitting there, with the conventional tea-table between them, he told her the simple truth about his meeting with Landon and Banks, and the wager. "I was nothing but a shabby imposter, even my name's false," he said bitterly. "It burns me up with shame. I made a vow I wouldn't come back here under false pretences. I was going away when you met me the other day. You ought to refuse to speak to me!" She seemed to consider this, for she said nothing for awhile, and his silence hurt him; it brought his misdeed home to him. She did not think him fit to speak to. He studied her profile; she had averted his face, and it seemed stern and resolute in it that he had not seen before. "I can't understand," she said in a low voice, "why a man like you should come here like that! To let yourself be—well, be brought here on a wager." His face crimsoned; she saw his strong hands clench and unclench; the veins stood out on them. "To make you understand that I'd have to tell you the story of my life," he replied hoarsely, "the whole story!" He was leaning forward now, his elbows on his knees, and his face worked as he stared into the fire.

"THE" ISLAND—A tourist and his wife from Honolulu were interviewed by an Island broadcasting station on board the ferry "Abegweit" en route to P. E. I. The lady used the term "the" Island. Interlocutor Nicholson was quick to notice the emphasis on "the" and asked how it came about. She said that she was "warned"—presumably to use the definite article—implying that it is the one and only Island. Notwithstanding the jokes about "the" island, it is referred to as "the" island in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and it bids fair to be known by that name in the other provinces and New England States. There is not much use in repudiating it now. It is too well known and accepted. According to Miss Holman's book on ancient Macmac history and mythology it was known by the Indians as "the" particular island. It was described by the great French explorer Jacques Cartier in most glorious terms. It supplied the great French fortress of Louisbourg with food during the French colonization period in the early 1700's. It was also the first of all the British North American colonies to be surveyed after the treaty of Paris in 1763, which was ample evidence of the esteem in which the island of St. Jean was held by the British government of the day. It is quite commonly referred to among the people of Western Canada as the "garden." So be it. "The" Island is the word.

While the tax collectors are busily whittling away at our incomes, they are also, curiously enough, trying to get rid of more than a million and a half dollars. But they can't find the people to whom to give this money. This is the residue of $310 million the Government collected during the war as compulsory savings. It amounts to close to $1,675,000 on the basis of nearly 68,000 people who have an average of $25 each coming to them. In 1948 and 1949 the Government tried to give the money back, but didn't quite succeed. The Department of National Revenue is still holding cheques for nearly 68,000 people who either never knew, or have forgotten, that the Government owes them money. Officials of the department are continually checking the tax rolls in the hope of finding some of them, but it's a slow process. The reason is that probably most of these 68,000 have moved, or changed their names by marriage, or died in the last seven or eight years. Actually, these 68,000 cheques represent less than two percent of all wartime compulsory savings. Most people lost no time in collecting the money owed to them. But 15,000 men and women who worked in Montreal during the war still have money owing them, and 14,000 in Vancouverites and 12,500 in Torontonians, and smaller numbers in other cities—as, for example, 85 in Kingston, 24 in Charlottetown, and a total of 1425 in Fredericton and Saint John. The tax officials get about 200 letters a month from individuals who think they have refundable savings coming to them. But unfortunately in nearly all cases they're mistaken. Either they've already received their savings, or they're not entitled to any. Officials say the way to discover if you're entitled to a compulsory savings refund is to check your income tax assessment forms for 1942, 1943 and 1944. If your pay cheque was being docked for compulsory savings, the assessment will show it. Take a look—maybe you're one of the 68,000 who can collect from the tax collectors.

Gerald Waring Reporting

OTTAWA—Now that nearly everybody's had a chance to feel the effect, in at least one pay cheque, of the Government's new income tax policies, it's probably a truism to say that nobody is happy about the situation. The 20 percent defence surtax would have been bad enough by itself—unwelcome even though necessary. But the immediate tax burden was made even heavier by the decision of the Department of National Revenue to collect the full income tax on the pay-as-you-go plan, and not merely 95 percent of it, as formerly. Of course, most taxpayers are no worse off in the long run because of this. If they didn't have to pay the extra five percent now, they'd have to pay it next spring—and departmental officials maintain that most people would rather pay the full tax as they go along, than have to scrape together the balance by April 30. Collection of the full tax will mean many more refund cheques must be issued next spring to people who have heavy medical or other expenses which are deductible from taxable income. But tax officials contend it's much simpler for them to issue refunds than to keep track of what remaining tax everyone owes the Treasury. That's the real reason why they adopted a full immediate collection policy.

While the tax collectors are busily whittling away at our incomes, they are also, curiously enough, trying to get rid of more than a million and a half dollars. But they can't find the people to whom to give this money. This is the residue of $310 million the Government collected during the war as compulsory savings. THE CHOLERIC TEMPERAMENT

The choleric temperament is one that is easily provoked—a word or a blow as some one has said. It is treated by Dante, and is purged on the third terrace of Purgatory. It is also the subject of a long discussion by Chaucer in the Perceval tale. Then of course it could not be passed by in the ethical teaching of the New Testament. Paul deals with it again and again, so does Jesus. The word that Chaucer uses is ira or anger, and he declares that there are two kinds—a good and a bad. A person should be wrath at wickedness. The Master drove the unholy traffickers out of the temple with a whip made of small cords. His conduct recalled a verse in the Old Testament, "The zeal of thy house has eaten me up." But there is a bad anger and it manifests itself in many ways, especially in profanity. On the terrace Dante dealt with it. "The terrace is partially, beclouded with an all-velling smoke—fog thicker than the infernal darkness, bitter to the taste, and adversely pungent to the eyes. The sin of anger is so obstructing to the mental eye as to make it incapable of seeing anything as it really is. Anger dims the vision to such an extent that one is unable to see the sun go down upon our wrath. What is the remedy proposed? Chaucer has a section headed thus—"Remedium contra iram," the remedy against anger. Dante shows inwardly in ecstatic vision, to the sufferers of this circuit the instances of Meekness and of Anger. They address an unceasing prayer to the lamb of God. Anger is due to the sins of love distorted. Chaucer is in line with the New Testament. He says that we need patience. To quote him: "This virtue maketh a man lik to God, and makith him Goddes dere child, as saith Crist." He makes much too of our enduring wrath. "There is an old saying, 'before you speak an angry word, count ten.' If we wait to count ten, the angry mood would pass. Of course the best deterrent of anger is to imitate the example of Jesus, who when he was reviled, reviled not again but committed his case to God. On the cross he prayed for those who were killing him—"Father forgive them for they know not what they do." It will help us also if we see a person in anger, to resolve that we shall never be in the same condition. Jonathan Edwards put down as one of his seventy resolutions, this that if ever he saw in another conduct that he disliked, he would seek to avoid such actions himself. That Shakespeare of divines, Jeremy Taylor, said that passions were the sails of the soul, and therefore should be managed and organized but not destroyed. There is such a thing as "holy indignation." I suppose some of us remember how Joseph Parker of London, when the sultan was engaged in violence against the Christians, ended a sermon with these words: "God damn the sultan!" Had he not paid for an authority in anathema marthanema. The conduct in question in Dr. Parker's case, that the world did not think that he had gone far out of his way. How true it is that "a soft answer turneth away wrath, but grievous words stir up anger." Perhaps an argument, though not of the highest kind, is what medical men say that fits of anger are hard on the heart and may cause death. It is one of the things that we are to "put away."

Charles at home. Also left to mourn are the following sisters: Adriana, who lived with him and helped him in the rearing of his children after the loss of their mother; Sr. Pastena of the Congregation of St. Martha, Charlottetown; Mary (Mrs. Bennett Trainor), Kelly's Cross; Helena (Mrs. Adrian Murray), Albany; and Mabel (Mrs. John Doyle) of Hope River. There are also two brothers, Joseph and Emmett, both of whom reside in Kelly's Cross. The funeral, which was from his late residence in Kelly's Cross to St. Joseph's Church, was very largely attended. Requiem High Mass was sung by his pastor, Rev. Kenneth MacMillan, who also held the committal service in the adjoining cemetery. The pall-bearers were his neighbours, namely: Justin Kelly, Louis Hogan, Eddy Bradley, James Greenan, Ambrose Monaghan and James McMahon. May he rest in peace. Amen.
