FOUL PLAY. CHAPTER II.

That same evening sat over their tea, in Norfolk street, Strand, another couple, who were also father and son; but, in this pair, the Wardlows were reversed. Michael Penfold was a reverend, gentle creature, with white hair, blue eyes, and great timidity; if a stranger put to him a question, he used to look all around the room before he ventured to answer.

Robert, his son, was a young man, with a large brown eye, a mellow voice, square shoulders, and a prompt and vigorous manner. Cricketer, scholar, and paragon.

They were talking hopefully together over a living Robert was going to buy; it was near Oxford, he said, and would not prevent him continuing to take pupils. 'But father,' said he, 'it will be a place to take my wife, if I ever have one; and, meantime, I hope you will run down now and then, Saturday to Monday.'

'That I will, Robert. Ah! how proud she would have been to hear you preach; it was always her dream, poor thing.'

'Let us think she can hear me,' said Robert. 'And I have got you still, the proceeds of this living will help me to lodge you more comfortably.'

'You are very good, Robert; I would rather see you spend it upon yourself; but, dear me, what a manager you must be to dress so beautifully as you do, and yet put by fourteen hundred pounds to buy this living.'

'You are mistaken, sir, I have only saved four hundred; the odd thousand—but that is a secret for this present.'

'Oh! I'm not inquisitive; I never was.' They then chatted about things of no importance whatever, and the old gentleman was just lighting his candle to go to bed, when a visitor was ushered into the room.

The Penfolds looked a little surprised, but not much. They had no street-door all to themselves; no liveried dragons to interpose between them and unseasonable or unwelcome visitors.

The man was well-dressed, with one exception; he wore a gold chain. He had a stooped back, and a black piercing eye. He stood at the door and observed every person and thing in the room minutely before he spoke a word.

Then he said, quietly: 'Mr. Michael Penfold, I believe.'

'At your service, sir.'

'And Mr. Robert Penfold.'

'I am Robert Penfold. What is your business?'

'Please is the Robert Penfold at the back of this note your writing?'

face of Michael Penfold looked out on this desperate and unseemly struggle, with hands that beat the air in helpless agony, and inarticulate cries of terror.

The detective got up and sat upon Robert Penfold's chest; and at last the three forced the handcuffs upon him, and took him in a cab to the station house.

Next day before the magistrate, Wardlaw senior proved the note was a forgery, and Mr. Adams' partner swore to the prisoner as the person who presented and endorsed the note. The officers attended, two with black eyes apiece, and one with his jaw bound up, and two sound teeth in his pocket, which had been driven from their sockets by the prisoner in his desperate attempt to escape. Their evidence hurt the prisoner, and the magistrate refused bail.

The Reverend Robert Penfold was committed to prison, to be tried at the Central Criminal Court, on a charge of felony.

Wardlaw senior returned home and told Wardlaw junior, who said not a word. He soon received a letter from Robert Penfold which agitated him greatly, and he promised to go and see him.

But he never went. He was very miserable, a prey to an inward struggle. He dared not offend his father on the eve of being made partner. Yet his heart bled for Robert Penfold.

He did what might perhaps have been expected from that pale eye and receding chin—he temporized. He said to himself: 'Before that horrible trial comes on, I shall be the house of Wardlaw, and able to draw a check for thousands. I'll buy off Adams at any price, and hush up the whole matter.'

So he hoped, and hoped. But the accountant was slow, the public prosecutor unusually quick, and to young Wardlaw's agony, the partnership deed was not ready when an imploring letter was put into his hands, urging him, by all that men hold sacred, to attend at the court as the prisoner's witness.

This letter almost drove young Wardlaw mad. He went to Adams, and entreated him not to carry the matter into court. But Adams was inexorable. He had got his money, but would be revenged for the fright.

Baffled here, young Wardlaw went down to Oxford and shut himself up in his own room, a prey to fear and remorse. He sported his oak, and never went out. All his exercise was that of a wild beast in its den, walking restlessly up and down.

But all his caution did not prevent the prisoner's solicitor from getting to him. One morning at seven o'clock, a clock slipped in at the heels of his scout, and coming to young Wardlaw's bedside, awoke him out of an uneasy slumber, by serving him with a subpoena to appear as Robert Penfold's witness.

The last stroke finished him. His bodily health gave way under his mental distress. Grief fever set in, and he was lying tossing and raving in delirium, while Robert Penfold was being tried at the Central Criminal Court.

The trial occupied six hours, and could be easily made rather interesting; but, for various reasons, with which it would not be good taste to trouble the reader, we decided to skim it.

The indictment contained two counts; one for forging the note of hand, the other for uttering it, knowing it to be forged.

On the first count the crown was weak, and had to encounter the evidence of Undercliff, the distinguished expert, who swore that the hand which wrote "Robert Penfold" was not, in his opinion, the hand that had written the body of the instrument. He gave many minute reasons in support of this, and nothing of any weight was advanced contra. The judge directed the jury to acquit the prisoner on that count.

But on the charge of uttering, the evidence was clear, and on the question of knowledge, it was, perhaps, a disadvantage to the prisoner that he was tried in England, and could not be heard in person, as he could have been in a foreign court; above all, his resistance to the officers eked out the presumption that he knew the note had been forged by some person or other, who was probably his accomplice.

ment can be arrested only on grounds of law. On these you can be heard; but, if you have none to offer, you must be silent and submit to your sentence.'

He then, without a pause, proceeded to point out the heinous character of the offense, but admitted there was one mitigating circumstance; and in conclusion, he condemned the culprit to five years penal servitude.

At this the poor wretch uttered a cry of anguish that was fearful, and clutched the dock convulsively.

Now, a prisoner rarely speaks to a judge without revolting him by bad law, or bad logic or hot words; but this wild cry was innocent of all these, and went straight from the heart in the dock to the heart in the judgment-seat. And so, his lordship's voice trembled for a moment, and then became firm again, but solemn and humane.

'But,' said he, 'my experience tells me this is your first crime and may possibly be your last. I shall, therefore, use my influence that you may not be associated with more hardened criminals, but may be sent out of this country to another, where you may begin life afresh, and, in the course of years efface this dreadful stain. Give me hopes of you; begin your repentance where you stand, by blaming yourself, and no other man. No man constrained you to utter a forged note, and to receive the money; it was found in your possession. For such an act there can be no defence in law, morality, or religion.'

These words overpowered the culprit. He burst out crying with great violence.

But it did not last long. He became strangely composed all of a sudden; and said: 'God forgive all concerned in this—but one—but one.'

He then bowed respectfully, and like a gentleman, to the judge and the jury, and walked out of the dock with the air of a man who had parted with emotion and would march to the gallows now without flinching.

The counsel for the crown required that the forged document should be impounded.

'I was about to make the same demand,' said the prisoner's counsel.

The judge snubbed them both and said it was a matter of course.

Robert Penfold spent a year in separate confinement, and then to cure him of his salutary effect (if any), was sent on board the hulk "Vengeance," and was herded with the greatest miscreants in creation. They did not reduce him to their level, but they injured his mind, and before half his sentence had expired, he sailed for a penal colony, a man with a hot coal in his bosom, a creature embittered; hoping little, believing little, fearing little, and hating much.

He took with him the prayer-book his mother had given him when he was ordained deacon. But he seldom read beyond the fly-leaf; there the poor lady had written at large her mother's heart, and her pious soul aspiring heavenward for her darling son. This, when all seemed darkest he would sometimes turn to with moist eyes; for he was sure of his mother's love, but almost doubted the justice of his God.

GAS-HEATING STOVES. THESE Stoves can be seen in operation every evening at Mr. G. H. Hazzard's Bookstore, South Side of Queen Square, where orders for Stoves can be left, and where an illustrated catalogue can be seen, containing every information. The cost of these Stoves range from $4.00 upwards. The cost of gas varies from less than one cent per hour upwards, according to the size of the stove and heat required. The great advantages of these Stoves are that they will heat any sized bedroom, nursery or sick room, in a few minutes after lighting the gas, the consumption of which can be instantly stopped by turning off the tap, thus preventing the waste of fuel, either before or after the necessary heat is required. No coal to be taken up stairs. No ashes to be brought down. No dust, dirt or smoke about the room, which is most important in case of sickness. At a cost of about one-half to three-fourths of a cent boiling water, warm food or hot drinks can be had at any time during the night, in from two to four minutes after lighting the gas, thus making the stove useful in the nursery and sick room, both summer and winter. The Stove also lights the room with the same gas that warms it. Ch'town, Oct. 24, 1883.—lm cod
