These days false teeth are made so artistically that they are often a great improvement upon the ones which Nature bestowed upon one. I know many pople who are far better-looking with their perfect store teeth than they were with their own misshapen and off-colored ones.

A girl should have more courage than to let herself be downed by a little physical affliction.

DOROTHY DIX cannot reply personally to readers, but will answer problems of general interest through her column.

The Golden Girl

By AGNES LOUISE PROVOST AND LADBROKE BLACK

He reached for the telephone and called the Ritz, asking for Miss Staunton. Miss Staunton's maid answered. Mademoiselle was away—in the country—by the sea. Madame Payne? Gorham heard the maid's voice sharpen. Madame Payne was no longer with mademoiselle. She had not been there for several weeks.

Gorham sat quiet for a while, thinking. Curious that the maid did not know, or would not tell where Gloria Staunton was. Evidently the questioning had confused her. In the country—by the sea. That was a queer combination. No, not so queer either. He reached for the telephone again.

"Hello Norton." Norton was a real estate broker whom he knew fairly well. "I wonder if you could put me in line to find out who bought Beechwood—the old Endicott place on the sound. A man I know thinks he would like to have it."

"Beechwood? Oh, yes, I remember. A man named Carver from Chicago was the agent. He bought it in for somebody, I don't know for whom."

Gorham pushed back the telephone. Carver, from Chicago! He put the crumpled enevelope carefully in his wallet.

It was nearly daylight when Gloria dropped asleep, and then she slumbered so heavily that when she opened her eyes to see Sara sitting beside her a clock was striking ten.

"Sara! I've been dreadfully lazy!"

"It doesn't matter, honey. But I had to call you, because somebody has been trying to get you on the telephone. It sounded like that Gorham creature. I never did like him. He said he understood you were at Beechwood and he wished to see you on important business."

"Oh!" Gloria was conscious of the cold fear which always crept over her when she met Gorham. "What did he say?"

"I told him he must have the wrong number," said Sara grimly, "and then I hung up. Do you suppose your maid told him Glory?"

"I don't know," said Gloria wearily. "I dont think so. I would trust Cecile anywhere. The only thing that matters is that he knows that I am at Beechwood—or suspects it. It was foolish of me to come here at all."

She threw out her hands impatiently. "I'm sick of it!" she burst out hotly. "I'm sick of hiding things and evading and pretending! It is mean and sordid and hateful. If only I had it to do again—" she stopped, shutting her lips tightly over the thing that she would do.

"Glory, dear, don't hide it any longer. There's nothing to be ashamed of."

"I must hide it—now." Gloria's voice sounded quiet and tired; the light of fierce rebellion in her eyes quenched suddenly. "It isn't merely my secret any more. It's his. It's Jack. When he car'd he would have been glad to have it known. Now it is different. I know I deserve it, Sara; I've been blind and selfish and mercenary, but I can't face being just his unacknowledged wife."

Something choked in Gloria's throat. Sara kissed her gently and left her alone. This was no time for argument. Then she put in a call for the Garrett-Hudson Motor Sales Company.

The voice at the other end of the line was not Jack Moreland's. Mr. Moreland was out. He might be in any moment and he might not come back until late in the afternoon. Sara stifled a gasp of dismay.

"When he comes in," she persisted, "please tell him to come at once to Beechwood. At once! Tell him it is very important."

Sara put the receiver back with an impatient sigh. "If he only gets here before she leaves, and if I get a chance to see him first! She must see him! I don't believe he doesn't love her any more."

It was almost noon when Jack came back to the salesroom, driving up to the curb in the big shining car which he had just been demonstrating. As he stopped a man loitering near the curb came forward and nodded slightly.

"Hello, Murphy."

"Hello Jack.".

Murphy was a quiet looking man with nondescript brown hair and nondescript grey suit, but the mild blue eyes were deceptive and under the grey coat, as Jack well knew, was a little shining shield which stood for the power of the law and the ability of Jim Murphy to enforce it. Jack had come to know the "plainclothes" man from Headquarters quite well in the grim days that had followed his aunt's murder.

"How are things getting along—or is that telling?"

"Oh, pretty fair," said Murphy, noncommittally. "Feel like dropping down at thirty-one? Got a dictograph in. From what we caught this morning the boss thought you might like to be tipped off for an appointment that we heard him make for twelve o'clock. Come to Room 529 on the fifth floor. I'll be there."

"Thanks. I'll follow, Jack said, and Murphy nodded and sauntered away.

Jack beckoned to a young man standing in the doorway of the salesroom.

"Tomm, look after this car, will you? And tell Mr. Morton that I've made the sale, but I am called away and may not be back for an hour or so."

He was off by the way Murphy had taken, and a few seconds later he hailed a taxicab. He could not afford it, but this called for haste.

Number 31 was a crowded office building in a crowded street, and the door of Room 529 opened into the most innocent looking of outer offices. Murphy was already there when Jack arrived. He nodded slightly, and together they went into the next room.

There were two other plainclothes men there, and a table with a poker-faced young man sit-

Doormat Coats Important Feature Of Fall Fashions

By Dorothy Roe
Associated Press Fashion Editor

NEW YORK, July 12—(AP)—The humble doormat becomes one of the important fashions of fall, 1950.

New York designers have startled visiting fashion editors with their "doormat coats," made of a heavy, fuzzy fabric in dark gray or deep tan neutral colors, worked into greatcoats that should be equal to any Arctic winter.

Omar Kiam of the house of Ben Reig opened his show with one of the bulky items in a deep charcoal gray, lined in bright plaid taffeta. It is a greatcoat cut full enough to wrap the figure like a cocoon, with big raglan sleeves cuffed at the wrist, flaring collar that can be turned up over the ears, and a general swashbuckling air.

Kiam showed also an almost endless series of "little black dresses," slim, svelte, dramatizing the curves of the figure. All are cut on simple sheath lines, with drapery or other accent at bust and hips, and trimly nipped waistlines.

Paul Parnes showed a highly sophisticated collection of dressy suits and dresses, highlights of which, as usual, were his costume suits consisting of dress and jacket in varying degrees of formality.

Study Canadian Furniture Designs

(By The Canadian Press)

OTTAWA, July 12 — Canadian furniture manufacturers are depending too much on designs borrowed from the United States and not working closely enough with Canadian design training institutes.

This was shown in a study of the Canadian furniture industry undertaken by the National Industrial Design Committee in co-operation with the Furniture Manufacturers Association.

Results weer released by the committee, formed two years ago to promote a greater use of Canadian talent in the designing of all types of consumer goods.

Main conclusion of the report was that "there is too much dependence on designs borrowed from the United States..."

Most of the factories covered in the survey said that American designing trends exert a great influence on Canadian production. Eighteen factories said they were influenced in this way and 106 other firms acknowledged that they were definitely influenced by American designs.

The report recommended a closer working relationship between manufacturers and existing design training institutes.

It was found that only 13 firms employed full-time designers while 36 used part-time designers. In many others, the owner, manager or some other official did the designing when required.

CIRCUS IN ARGUMENT

MONCTON, N.B., July 11—(CP) This city and Daley Brothers' Circus had an argument about streets and water supplies but everything passed off peacefully.

The circus engaged a lawyer to iron things out when the city stipulated it would impose an unloading fee if streets were blocked during train-unloading operations.

Then, when the city proposed to charge more than the tentatively named rate of $20 for water, the circus produced its own supplies in 500-gallon tanks.

Ellen's Diary

cre of drawings we find has the power to stir our emotions—to revive a memory. We thing now of one of Jamie's efforts, or of others that decorate our study-of-sorts. We would remember as well, with thanks, the (anonymous) sender of the Summer edition of the Mt. Allison Record, the cover holding a reproduction of "Mrs. Edward Salisbury and Daughter" by George Romney, the famous eighteenth century painter. This painting which is, we feel, beautiful in subject an so obviously of tranquil quality was the gift to his Alma Mater from a Summerside boy who had counted it among his "treasured possessions. "He" also presented to Mt. Allison two limited editicn books by Wm. Roberts on the paintings, essays and diaries of Romney, as well as a hand-written letter by the latter testifying to the authenticity of this painting. "These are indeed gifts from the heart to benefit many a student-in-Art in succeeding years. We recall that, Ellen, niece of ours and namesake, spent some time there prior to taking up her duties as a school teacher and has a warm place in her affections for the halls of Mt. A.
