

Salk Vaccine Rejected By British As Too Dangerous

By JACK GREAVES
LONDON (Reuters)—Britain has rejected the American Salk anti-polio vaccine in its present form as being too dangerous and cancelled plans for trying it out. The decision of the British Medical Research Council was announced Friday by Dr. G.S. Wilson, director of the Public Health Laboratory Service. He was speaking at a luncheon of the National Fund for Poliomyelitis Research. Wilson said Britain is experimenting now, trying to find a safer formula, but added: "I don't think the search for a polio vaccine is likely to be a short one."

MAY NEVER BE SAFE!
He said there is a question whether it will ever be possible to make a vaccine of the Salk Type quite safe.

The government health ministry had decided last month to postpone trials of the Salk vaccine, but today Wilson declared:

"I think it only right to tell you now that the right word is cancelled. We do not feel justified in carrying out in this country tests on the Salk vaccine as it is at present."

"There are many things about the Salk vaccine which we don't like."

He described events leading up to the inoculation of 5,000,000 American children with the Salk formula. Of the 100 youngsters who developed convulsions, it seemed probable that 60 to 80 contracted it as a direct result of the inoculation, he said.

GREAT SHOCK
"This came as a great shock to the world, but those who realized many of the inherent defects of the Salk vaccine which had been glossed over, were not wholly surprised."

He said one of the great difficulties in vaccine of the Salk type is to be certain scientifically of destroying the bacteria or virus by such a substance as formaldehyde, and that there is a narrow range of safety between effectiveness and danger. "It is very difficult to avoid the conclusion that formaldehyde cannot be relied on in practice to destroy completely the virus and that the human child is more susceptible than any test we have in the laboratory."

WILL BE LONG SEARCH

The medical expert said it is the consensus not only in Britain but, he believes, in the United States as well that a vaccine prepared of living attenuated virus would be more likely to fulfil anti-polio requirements than a dead virus. There were strains of virus which would do that, but it would be a long search, possibly a matter of years.

"We are hoping to modify the Salk vaccine in such a way that
