CONTRACT BRIDGE

By R. JAY BECKER

the clubs were divided 3-3; or that the diamond finesse would work.

There were two ways to play the hand South could test both the clubs and hearts, and if neither club broke 3-3, then fall back on the diamond finesse. This method would have failed. Declarer would have lost three spades, a heart, and a diamond.

Or South could enter dummy and take a diamond finesse without bothering with hearts or clubs (This method—West could cash three spades and a diamond, but declarer would then score nine tricks).

Declarer chose the second method and made the contract. He reasoned that West had indicated by his opening lead that he had only a four-card spade suit, and that if this were the case the contract could not be defeated.

West had led the three of spades, presumably his fourth best spade. This meant West had three spades higher than the three spot. He could have none lower since the deuce was in sight in dummy.

It could be argued West might have had more than four spades and that the three-spot was false-play led from a five-card suit. This possibility is granted. It gets down to the question of knowing how your opponents play and how often they bluff. That's why we started by saying bridge is not played in a vacuum.

Opening lead—three of spades. Bridge is not played in a vacuum. The theoretical must give way to the practical. A great many decisions by declarer are based upon plays and bids made by the opponents and not solely upon the 26 cards he sees in his own hand and dummy's.

The presumption is that the opponents are trying to win and that all their bids and plays are presumed to be in the best of good faith. It means only that they are not deliberately trying to lose.

South won the spade lead with the king and could count eight sure tricks. There were three possibilities for a ninth trick; that the hearts were divided 3-3; that
