SONGS OF THE BIRDS

A GOSSIPY ARTICLE ON THE SWEET AND CHEERFUL WARBLERS.

What their Notes Mean as Heard in the Springtime Wood and Field—Love-Making by Our Feathered Friends—What an Ornithologist Has Observed.

On a recent evening, just as the sun went down, we were returning from a woodland stroll, and on approaching the swampy valley, where willows and reeds abound, our attention was arrested by the low, clear piping of a red-winged blackbird. On looking up into the trees we saw three, two of which were males and one a female, and we had a good opportunity of seeing how the songs of birds enter into their love-making. The dusky female sat apparently unconcerned, while the glossy black males, with their orange-tinted bars on each wing, spread out their plumes, bowed as if in adoration and sang their monotone assiduously. After a while she seemed weary of their attentions, and hopped to another branch at a distance from her lovers. They followed and repeated their wooing, but, apathetic still, she paid no heed to their wiles. At length, as if in disgust, she took flight, and with a headlong dash at each other they followed to renew their suit once more.

Presently the rich, mellow notes of a robin burst forth as he sat boldly and proudly on the topmost twig of a neighboring oak. There is no mistaking that lusty song which proclaims the bird a member of the thrush family. You hear the tone and cadence which alike characterize this native of America, the blackbird and song thrush of England, and the red wing, which is called the nightingale of Norway. Doubtless, somewhere in the undergrowth, the female was sitting, as happy in the recognition of the voice of her mate as ever Juliet was at the words of Romeo.

Soon the woods and hedge rows will be alive with the songs of the birds, and lovers of nature will find enjoyment in abundance. The early morning is the best time to hear the concert. In the eastern contingent they have the nightingale to sing in the "witching hour of night" and certainly it is delicious to hear the strains of that marvelous warbler, when its voice alone breaks the silence under "the moon's pale beams." No wonder that such is "the poet's hour," when the "idle fancies throng." But give me the dawn, when the whole feathered tribe awakes to new life, and from every tree and shrub the songs burst forth. As soon as the first gray streak appears in the east, the robins are astir, and as the gray becomes rosy and then yellow, one by one the members of the chorus join in, until the air rings with sound. Then, indeed, "the birds chant melody in every bush." The listener may well be reminded of quaint Izaak Walton's words: "Lord, what music hast thou provided for the Saints in Heaven when Thou afforest sinful man such music on earth!"

A learned ornithologist has said: "It is necessary in a philosophical spirit to regard every sound made by a bird under the all-powerful influence of love or lust as a 'song.' But surely all the songs of birds are not to be ascribed to this influence. Doubtless many birds sing only during the nesting season, as if the husband was anxious to cheer his wife in her domestic cares. Such is certainly the case with the far-famed nightingale, who ceases his song as soon as the young birds are hatched. During the period of egg laying and incubation, his sounds are best described as rushing like a cataract, but by the middle of June his voice is only a harsh frog-like croak, or the low guttural note of a raven. Others, however, sing all the year round. Who has not heard the wren on the woodpile, the snowbird and sparrows on the trees in the orchard, whenever the winter's sun has made the snow and icicles sparkle like brilliants? Birds in confinement have no mates to woo, nor labor to soften. They sing from simple vigor of life. The mocking bird in his native haunts not only sings his natural song of sweetness, but pours forth all sorts of sounds, even to the "gobble" of the turkey, from sheer love of singing. You may hear him rehearse in a low undertone, until he feels sure his lesson is mastered, and then out the voice bursts with full force ringing with the very pride of excellence.

There is, however, a very powerful influence which cannot escape the notice of the lover of birds, and that is emulation. Even in wild nature you may catch the ring of it, as one bird answers another in the woods, each halting for a moment or two to listen to his rival; and this, too, long after the mating season is over.

Perhaps one of the most wonderful points about the songs of birds is that there is abundant reason for thinking that there are dialects among them. Few lovers of nature, who have lived in several districts, will hesitate to say that such is the case. Not only there more vigor in the song of, say the robin, in one district than in another, but although the notes are the same, they are arranged differently, so that while the cadences are similar the tune is unmistakably changed, and the singing is pitched in a different key. It may truly be said that in the songs of birds there are provincial idioms, and it is not all mere sentiment which makes the man who was born and brought up in the country, but has moved in later life to the city say that the birds sang better in the woods of his native place than they do in the city.

Irish Pronunciation.
An amusing example of the Irishman's pronunciation occurs in a story told of the late Dr. Todd, the Irish archaeologist, who, although a great scholar, was not above perpetrating a practical joke. The London Spectator tells the story and says:
A very learned Englishman went to Dublin to examine some manuscripts in the library of Trinity college and was of course introduced to Dr. Todd, who one day in conversation told him that there was in Trinity college a curious instance of the survival of a habit dating from the time of the Danes; that at a certain hour of the afternoon—I think 6 o'clock—a porter went the round of the college ringing a bell and calling out in a loud voice, "The Dane's in the hall," when all the students rushed from their rooms to repel the invaders. So the learned but somewhat incredulous Englishman repaired to the college at 6 o'clock, and, sure enough, what Dr. Todd had told him came to pass, which he gravely related on his return to England. The summons of course referred to the dean.

He Wasn't a Gormand.
That wary old fellow, Bailie Macduff, was enticed into a friend's house the other night, and his host managed to win 50 shillings from him at "nap." What is more remarkable, when the bailie had parted with his last shilling he rose, full of wrath.
"Won't you stay to supper?" pressed his host. "We have a fine bit of ham waiting."
"No, not I. Dae ye think I eat 50 shillings' worth of ham?"—London Answers.

Hardly.
