THE GIRL WHO WON.
By Mattie Dyer Britts.
'Well, that's all there is, girls! We can keep the house, and there's very little to live on. Where the rest is to come from I don't know!'
Mrs. Horatio Seymour shook out her rich robes with a jeweled hand, and settled herself in her easy chair, as she spoke.
She and her three girls, Bell, Laura and Des (which latter was short for Desdemonia) were just out of mourning for Mr. Seymour. The estate was just settled also. It had been left insolvent, but they hoped to the last that there would be at least a good living remaining out of large wealth. But the result had been announced by the lawyers to Mrs. Seymour that day—almost nothing, as she told the two girls. Des, the younger daughter knew it already, having been present when the lawyers told her mother. Now she was out, no one knew just where. As neither Bell nor Laura replied to her first remark, Mrs. Seymour continued:—
'I don't see what's to be done, unless you girls can marry.'
'I wonder who?' said Laura, scornfully. 'Good matches don't go around hunting up poor girls!'
'Sometimes they do!' said Mrs. Seymour, significantly. 'And with your beauty and the clothes you have already, surely something might be done!'
'If we could go somewhere!' suggested Bell.
'That is out of the question!' returned Mrs. Seymour.
'We'll have to get money to buy more clothes before we do anything else,' said Laura.
'How do you propose to get it?' asked Mrs. Seymour.
'I don't know. We might take boarders, like the Allies did, when they failed.'
'Oh, horrors!' cried Mrs. Seymour.
'Laura, you're a fool!' snapped Bell.
'Well, we will have to do something!' stoutly insisted Laura.
'Then do what I said—get married, as quickly as you can,' said the mother.
'By the way, girls, Harry Oxenford is home.'
'Who told you?' asked Bell, as the girls exchanged glances.
'His sister, Mrs. Hunter. I met her in Schon's store yesterday. And he's richer than ever. I used to fancy he admired one of you.'
'He certainly used to be attentive to me, said Bell, with a slight smile.
'Now, Bell, it was I he admired,' said Laura, quickly.
'Was it? Perhaps it was Des?' was Bell's answer, given with strong sarcasm.
'Fancy any man admiring that little black thing!' cried Laura, angrily.
At that moment the door opened, and 'that little black thing' herself came in, with a sparkle in her eyes which suggested the idea that she might have heard the last words.
But they didn't care if she had—Des was used to being snubbed by her sisters. Little she was, and undeniably dark, and not such a beauty as the tall, haughty blondes, Bell and Laura. But she had fine eyes, and when she was animated or excited, many men who had fair tastes would have looked at her rather than at them. They would have looked just the same, going to be married or going to be hanged, because they had no expression and could not change.
'Where have you been?' was the chorus which greeted Desdemonia's entrance.
'Been solving the question,' was her cool reply.
'What question?' asked Mrs. Seymour.
'The living question. Somebody has got to work. And I thought it might as well be my turn as not.'
'Nothing dreadful,' answered Des. 'I have hired myself out, that's all.'
'Hired yourself out!' screamed both girls and the mother. 'Good gracious! In somebody's kitchen?'
'Not quite so bad as that. Though I would have done that, had nothing better offered. I have hired as clerk in Sloan's fancy store, at six hundred dollars a year.'
'A shop girl! Des, you mustn't! It would ruin us!' groaned Bell.
'Of course she mustn't! Just fancy what people would say!' echoed Laura.
'Girls, let her alone, said Mrs. Seymour. 'It wouldn't do for one of you of course, but Des is different, and no one will mind. She won't need half her salary to dress on—'
'I shall not need any of it, unless my shoes give out,' said Des, firmly.
'Well, say two hundred—and I tell you, girls, four hundred a year added to what we have will help you amazingly.'
'Don't let it get out then,' cried Laura. 'Harry Oxenford never would call on us if he knew our sister was a shop girl.'
'Is he at home?' asked Des.
'Yes, you don't remember him, do you?' said Bell.
'It strikes me I ought too, as he has only been gone two years, and I am eighteen now.'
'Oh, well, you were a mere schoolgirl, not out in company then.'
'Perhaps. But I knew people when I saw 'em,' said Des coolly.
'She did not say a word more about Mr. Harry Oxenford, but she recalled several little kind acts he had done her, especially a box of bon-bons he had given her one Christmas, which, (the pretty box, at least, not the bon-bons!) lay upstairs in her drawer now. And she remembered how she used to wish she were 'out,' like her sisters, and could have such handsome beaux as Harry Oxenford!
But there were likely to be no beaux in Des Seymour's life now. It must be a very work-a-day world for her, to help mother and the girls.
And they, though they were ashamed to have it known that she worked in a store,

'Then do what I said—get married, as quickly as you can,' said the mother.
'By the way, girls, Harry Oxenford is home.'
'Who told you?' asked Bell, as the girls exchanged glances.
'His sister, Mrs. Hunter. I met her in Schon's store yesterday. And he's richer than ever. I used to fancy he admired one of you.'
'He certainly used to be attentive to me, said Bell, with a slight smile.
'Now, Bell, it was I he admired,' said Laura, quickly.
'Was it? Perhaps it was Des?' was Bell's answer, given with strong sarcasm.
'Fancy any man admiring that little black thing!' cried Laura, angrily.
At that moment the door opened, and 'that little black thing' herself came in, with a sparkle in her eyes which suggested the idea that she might have heard the last words.
But they didn't care if she had—Des was used to being snubbed by her sisters. Little she was, and undeniably dark, and not such a beauty as the tall, haughty blondes, Bell and Laura. But she had fine eyes, and when she was animated or excited, many men who had fair tastes would have looked at her rather than at them. They would have looked just the same, going to be married or going to be hanged, because they had no expression and could not change.
'Where have you been?' was the chorus which greeted Desdemonia's entrance.
'Been solving the question,' was her cool reply.
'What question?' asked Mrs. Seymour.
'The living question. Somebody has got to work. And I thought it might as well be my turn as not.'
'Nothing dreadful,' answered Des. 'I have hired myself out, that's all.'
'Hired yourself out!' screamed both girls and the mother. 'Good gracious! In somebody's kitchen?'
'Not quite so bad as that. Though I would have done that, had nothing better offered. I have hired as clerk in Sloan's fancy store, at six hundred dollars a year.'
'A shop girl! Des, you mustn't! It would ruin us!' groaned Bell.
'Of course she mustn't! Just fancy what people would say!' echoed Laura.
'Girls, let her alone, said Mrs. Seymour. 'It wouldn't do for one of you of course, but Des is different, and no one will mind. She won't need half her salary to dress on—'
'I shall not need any of it, unless my shoes give out,' said Des, firmly.
'Well, say two hundred—and I tell you, girls, four hundred a year added to what we have will help you amazingly.'
'Don't let it get out then,' cried Laura. 'Harry Oxenford never would call on us if he knew our sister was a shop girl.'
'Is he at home?' asked Des.
'Yes, you don't remember him, do you?' said Bell.
'It strikes me I ought too, as he has only been gone two years, and I am eighteen now.'
'Oh, well, you were a mere schoolgirl, not out in company then.'
'Perhaps. But I knew people when I saw 'em,' said Des coolly.
'She did not say a word more about Mr. Harry Oxenford, but she recalled several little kind acts he had done her, especially a box of bon-bons he had given her one Christmas, which, (the pretty box, at least, not the bon-bons!) lay upstairs in her drawer now. And she remembered how she used to wish she were 'out,' like her sisters, and could have such handsome beaux as Harry Oxenford!
But there were likely to be no beaux in Des Seymour's life now. It must be a very work-a-day world for her, to help mother and the girls.
And
