KING'S EVIL

Was the name formerly given to Scrofula because of a superstition that it could be cured by a king's touch. The world is wiser now, and knows that

SCROFULA

can only be cured by a thorough purification of the blood. If this is neglected, the disease perpetuates its taint through generation after generation. Among its earlier symptomatic developments are Eczema, Cutaneous Eruptions, Tumors, Boils, Carbuncles, Erysipelas, Purulent Ulcers, Nervous and Physical Collapse, etc. If allowed to continue, Rheumatism, Scrofulous Carcarrs, Kidney and Liver Diseases, Tubercular Consumption, and various other dangerous or fatal maladies, are produced by it.

Ayer's Sarsaparilla

Is the only powerful and always reliable blood-purifying medicine. It is so effectual an alternative that it eradicates from the system Hereditary Scrofula, and the kindred poisons of contagious diseases and mercury. At the same time it enriches and vitalizes the blood, restoring healthful action to the vital organs and rejuvenating the entire system. This great Regenerative Medicine

Is composed of the genuine Honduras Sarsaparilla, with Yellow Dock, Stillingia, the Iodides of Potassium and Iron, and other ingredients of great potency, carefully and scientifically compounded. Its formula is generally known to the medical profession, and the best physicians constantly prescribe AYER'S SARSAPARILLA as a

Absolute Cure

For all diseases caused by the vitiation of the blood. It is concentrated to the highest practicable degree, far beyond any other preparation for which like effects are claimed, and is therefore the cheapest, as well as the best blood purifying medicine, in the world.

CHAPTER XL

'Yes, I'm afraid the grief cuts very deep,' said Mr. Irwine. 'He looks terribly shattered, and a certain violence came over him now and then yesterday, which made me wish I could have remained near him.
But I shall go to Stoniton again to-morrow, and I have confidence enough in the strength of Adam's principle to trust that he will be able to endure the worst without being driven to any thing rash.'

Mr. Irwine, who was involuntarily uttering his own thoughts rather than addressing Bartle Massey in the last sentence, had in his mind the possibility that the spirit of vengeance toward Arthur, which was the form Adam's anguish was continually taking, might make him seek an encounter that was likely to end more fatally than the one in the Grove. This possibility heightened the anxiety with which he looked forward to Arthur's arrival. But Bartle thought Mr. Irwine was referring to suicide, and his face wore a new alarm.

'I'll tell you what I have in my head, sir,' he said, 'and I hope you'll approve of it. I'm going to shut up my school; if the scholars come, they must go back again, that's all; and I shall go to Stoniton and look after Adam till this business is over.
I'll pretend I'm come to look on at the assizes; he can't object to that. What do you think about it, sir?'

'Well,' said Mr. Irwine, rather hesitatingly, 'there would be some real advantages in that—and I honor you for your friendship toward him, Bartle. But—you must be careful what you say to him, you know.
I'm afraid you have too little fellow-feeling in what you consider his weakness about Hetty.'

'Trust to me, sir—trust to me. I know what you mean. I've been a fool myself in my time, but that's between you and me. I shan't thrust myself on him—only keep my eye on him, and see that he gets some good food, and put in a word here and there.'

'Then,' said Mr. Irwine, reassured a little as to Bartle's discretion. 'I think you'll be doing a good deed, and it will be well for you to let Adam's mother and brother know that you're going.'

'Yes, sir—yes,' said Bartle, rising, and taking off his spectacles. 'I'll do that—I'll do that—though the mother's a whimpering thing—I don't like to come within ear-shot of her; however, she's a straight-backed clean woman—none of your slatterns. I wish you good-bye, sir, and thank you for the time you've spared me. You're every body's friend in this business—every body's friend. It's a heavy weight you've got on your shoulders.'

'Good-bye, Bartle, till we meet at Stoniton, as I dare say we shall.'

Bartle hurried away from the Rectory, evading Carrol's conversational advances, and saying, in an exasperated tone, to Vixen, whose short legs pattered beside him on the gravel.

'Now, I shall be obliged to take you with me, you good-for-nothing woman.
You'd go fretting yourself to death if I left you; you know you would, and perhaps get snatched up by some tramp; and you'll be running into bad company, I expect, putting your nose into every hole and corner where you've no business; but if you do anything disgraceful I'll disown you—mind that, madam—mind that!'

CHAPTER XLI

THE EVE OF THE TRIAL.

An upper room in a dull Stoniton street, with two beds in it—one laid on the floor.
It is ten o'clock on Thursday night, and the dark wall opposite the window shuts out the moonlight that might have struggled with the light of the one dip candle by which Bartle Massey is pretending to read, while he is really looking over his spectacles at Adam Bede, seated near the dark window.

You would hardly have known it was Adam without being told. His face had got thinner this last week; he has the sunken eyes, the neglected beard of a man just risen from a sick bed. His heavy black hair hangs over his forehead, and there is no active impulse in him which inclines him to push it off, that he may be more awake to what is around him. He has one arm over the back of the chair, and he seems to be looking down at his clasped hands. He is roused by a knock at the door.

'There he is,' said Bartle Massey, rising hastily and unfastening the door. It was Mr. Irwine.

Adam rose from his chair with instinctive respect as Mr. Irwine approached him and took his hand.

'I'm late, Adam,' he said, sitting down on the chair which Bartle placed for him; 'but I was later in setting off from Broxton than I intended to be, and I have been incessantly occupied since I arrived. I've done everything now, however—everything that can be done to-night, at least. Let us sit down.'

Adam took his chair again mechanically, and Bartle, for whom there was no chair remaining, sat on the bed in the background.

'Have you seen her, sir?' said Adam, tremulously.

'Yes, Adam, I and the chaplain have both been with her this evening.'

'Did you ask her, sir . . . did you say anything about me?'

'Yes,' said Mr. Irwine, with some hesitation. 'I spoke of you. I said you wished to see her before the trial, if she consented.'

As Mr. Irwine paused, Adam looked at him with eager, questioning eyes.

'You know she shrinks from seeing any one, Adam. It is not only you—some fatal influence seems to have shut up her heart against her fellow-creatures. She has scarcely said anything more than 'No,' either to me or the chaplain. Three or four days ago, before you were mentioned to her, when I asked her if there was any one of her family whom she would like to see—to whom she could open her mind, she said, with a violent shudder. 'Tell them not to come near me—I won't see any of them.'

Adam's head was hanging down again, and he did not speak. There was silence for a few minutes, and then Mr. Irwine said,

'I don't like to advise you against your own feelings, Adam, if they now urge you strongly to go and see her to-morrow morning, even without her consent. It is just possible, notwithstanding appearances to the contrary, that the interview might affect her favorably. But I grieve to say I have scarcely any hope of that. She didn't seem agitated when I mentioned your name; she only said 'No,' in the same cold, obstinate way as usual. And if the meeting had no good effect on her, it would be pure, unless suffering to you—severe suffering to I fear. She is very much changed—'

(To be continued.)

The Reciprocity Question.

(Parliamentary Correspondence of the Montreal Gazette.)

Upon motion to go into committee of supply this afternoon, Mr. Davies presented the first of seven amendments which it is understood the Opposition intend to move.
It related to the subject of reciprocal trade with the United States, and wound up with the declaration that in view of the early termination of the fishery clauses of the Washington Treaty, negotiations for Reciprocity ought to be at once opened up, and that Canada ought to be represented in such negotiations. This question, one would think, has been debated and discussed ad nauseam. Yet a whole day has again been wasted in belaboring the dead horse. Mr. Davies repeated his speech of last session to an impatient house, devoting much time to exposing what everyone admits, the desirability of concluding a fair treaty with the United States. He seemed to imagine that his argument was strenghtened by quotations from resolutions of local bodies in the United States in favor of the conclusion of a treaty, forgetting that the government is required to deal not with these corporations but with the President, Senate and House of Representatives of the country. It is worthy of remark, too, that the men who are now so greatly disturbed by the early termination of the Washington Treaty, were unostentatious in their condemnation of Sir John Macdonald when that instrument was concluded. The whole case of the Opposition was knocked endways in the neat and telling speech of Mr. Woodworth, who has always something worth listening to to say, when he quoted from an answer made by Mr. Mac-Kenzie in 1878, when he was leading the Government, to a question put to him by one of his own supporters, to the effect that the Canadian Government could take no step in the direction of reciprocity until the American Government had manifested its willingness to treat. That was the view of the Liberal party in office and it is yet the view of every sensible man in the country. The present Government has, however, gone farther than their predecessors towards securing the end sought, having placed upon the statute book a declaration of its desire to obtain reciprocity and its willingness to remove the duties upon natural products the instant the United States Government removes its duties on like products imported from Canada, and only last year our government gave assurance to an influential commercial deputation from the United States of its willingness to throw off the duties on coal, iron, lumber and salt if the American Government would reciprocate. There is, in fact, no issue between parties on this subject.
Both are anxious for reciprocity, and the Government only awaits the expression of a desire in that direction on the part of the United States. The Congress of that country last year refused to entertain a proposition of reciprocity. A change of government there may happily lead to better results, and our own government may be trusted to avail of every opportunity for securing a fair treaty. But to talk of neglect on the part of the ministry in the light of the facts and of the attitude taken by the liberal party, when in office is to talk arrant nonsense.

Mr. Davies' resolution was rejected by a vote of 98 nays to 58 yeas, a comparatively small ministerial majority, but this falling off is easily accounted for by the prompt departure of volunteer officers to the front in the service of their country, all of whom, not a matter of wonder, happen to belong to the ministerial party. The Grits refused to give pairs in the anticipation of cutting down the government strength, but the country will not be slow to condemn the pettiness of these blatant patriots, who prove only partisans on an occasion of emergency.

The nomination as President of the British Association at the Birmingham meeting in 1886 has been offered to Sir William Dawson, C. M. G., LL. D., F. R. S., Principal of McGill College, Montreal, and he has telegraphed his intention of accepting the honor. Sir William is a Pictonian.
