First Baptist's CGIT, Explorers Have Service

On May 28th the CGIT and Explorers of the Charlottetown First Baptist Church, with their mothers as guests, held their affiliation services with the Dr. Zella Clark Mission Circle and the Ferne Levy Chapter of The World Wide Guild, in the church hall.

The chairman for the Explorer service was Joanne MacMillan, chief explorer. Interesting reports on their mission study on Bolivia were given by Gail Robinson and Anne Gillespie. Their offering for missions was accepted by Mrs. S. H. Burhoe, president of the Dr. Zella Clark Mission Circle. The affiliation badges were presented by Mrs. H. L. Mitton who then gave an inspirational talk on the four S's - Surrender, Sincere, Solitude and Service. In this message to the girls she pointed out that by surrendering their lives to Christ, being sincere wherever they are, spending some time each day in solitude for prayer and Bible study and by Christian service, they will truly be living up to their purpose to become the girls that God would have them be.

Slides on Bolivia were then shown.

Lunch was served to all present. The table was centred by a graceful arrangement of red carnations flanked by blue and white tapers, representing the CGIT and Explorer colors.

ELLEN'S DIARY

Gold Of Day's First Sun Glints Across The Valley

"Stop a while and catch your breath," we begged James, husband of ours, this morning, when he pushed back his chair after breakfast and reached for his cap. And the day was new in the valley, with the gold of first sunlight gilding it prettily here and there. No wind moved yet. So pretty the countryside lay in this cropping-time, with its checkered fields, green and red. Pretty too the groves and woodlands, daintily colorful now in the varied shades of the leafing trees, bright against the dark of spruce and fir.

"Can't, Ellen," James said. "Not with the seeding not done. Got to make every day count now!"

"There," we smiled looking past him, "the herons are back! See, there's one on a spruce by the dam. Isn't that a rare sight!

"Just stop to look at cranes," he twinkled, "not before the crop's all in."

"And then it will be too late," we said. "And we'll have a long wait before spring, as it is today comes again."

"That's the pity of it, isn't it, Ellen? Seems as though we had more time to enjoy it in our young years, before the farm-biz got cluttered up with too many machines. Then when a farmer was resting his horses a bit,thing their collars to ease their shoulders, or just letting them catch their wind now and then through the day, he had time to look out over the country-side and realize how good the cropping-time was. But now . . . well, with the rush of things, it's little wonder that folks' hearts soon wear out!"

"And what work is ahead for today?"

"There'll be harrowing. . . . and some sowing, I expect. At Rob's they're hoping to get a piece of turnip-land readied, and sowed. There's lime to come. And by rights we should get some of it spread. . . .And that, Ellen," he grinned "is only mentioning a little of it. There's work to the cropping, you know."

So the farming moved on, in the fields. It was good to hear the rhythm of the tractors and to see the sunny skies favor the patterns they set.

High up in the golden willow in mid-yard a robin nests, the site surrounded by the bright lace of new leaves.

"See her head above the nest? No car can get her there," Alex smiled happily today.

"I have an idea," James offered, peering off up the fields toward the dusk "that heifer has had her calf. Come, Ellen, see what you think of things-see. she keeps there in the stumpland away from the rest of the herd! Can you make out anything beside her? No? Then run in, and fetch me my glasses. No, there's no calf to be seen but I'll wager she has one. I'll have to get back there and try to find it."

There is a calf. But where? He could find no trace of it there.

"A fox couldn't take it," Mack said.

"She has hidden it somewhere - we'll have to leave it till morning," James decided.

"I won't be alone." Alex smiled. "The heifer will come to it in the dark-she'll watch out for it, while it rests."

And in the dark, our day too, now comes to rest.

Until tomorrow — — Diary— Good-night. . .

IDA BAILEY ALLEN

Sirloin Steak Is Served With New French Accent

BY IDA BAILEY ALLEN

AS IN olden days, the door to the gray stone building near the Etoile in Paris was equipped with heavy bolts, bars and locks and opened into a wood-paneled lobby.

A "lift" just big enough to hold two persons, took us up to the home of the Comte and Comtesse de Renty.

LOVELY APARTMENT

The spacious, high - ceilinged apartment was lovely with old damask and velvet draperies, beautiful paintings, French heirloom furniture, welcoming soft lights.

Mme. de Renty served aperitifs. Her two young sons, ten and 12 years old, passed salted almonds and slender cheese biscuits. The boys were refreshingly well-mannered, conversed if brought into the conversation, but never interrupted.

WORKING ON CAMPAIGN

Mme. de Renty is on the staff of a distinguished Public Relations firm. She was enthusiastically working on a campaign to "Clean Up and Wash Up Paris" conducted by the federations of painters, builders and tourism. One by one, the glorious old stone buildings, gray with the grime of generations, are being restored to their original brightness and spotlighted at night.

The Comte de Renty is a distinguished chemical engineer, with cooking as a hobby.

COOKS ON SATURDAYS

"Every Saturday afternoon," he said, "I take over the kitchen and cook for at least four hours. Cooking can be a relaxing pastime.

"Some of the finest restaurant food in Paris isn't expensive," he continued, "It is prepared in little out-of-the-way bistros run entirely by a husband and wife. We are taking you to dinner at one of our favorites, Restaurant Camille, 27, Rue des Ecoles, Paris."

WHAT A MENU!

The hors d'oeuvres we tasted-tested were mussels escalloped in small ramekins and snails baked in pastry cases.

For entrees we had wild boar tournedos en cocotte and steak au poivre followed by salade de saison. Then a cheese tray.

For dessert, mousse au chocolat and raspberry charlotte, followed by cafe noir.

The food and wines were delectable.

Today we give two of the recipes; others will follow later.

TOMORROW'S DINNER

MAPY HAWORTH

Sexy Redhead Makes Bid For Wealthy Greek Man

Dear Mary Haworth: Some days ago you discussed the case of a certain young woman who isn't in love with a certain young man, age 36, of Greek descent, who happens to have a bank account of $150,000. Foolish girl.

Would you do me a favor and spend him my way? I could learn to love him real fast for that kind of money. I am in debt and could certainly use it.

I am five feet two inches tall, have red hair, a slee figure (118 pounds), real sexy looking.

I am scarcer his age than the girl (who is 21, as I remember) and I am sure he would like me when he knows me.

I can just see myself: furs, jools and satins. No more broken nails, dragged-out feelings and all that stuff that we working women suffer. I am sure you agree with me. P.S.: Could you use 10 percent as a gift from her after I land him? I await your help in meeting Mr. Greek Big Bankroll. - R.C.

Dear R.C.: Your day dream of "how to get rich quick" is the same category as the fable about the country maiden who made the mistake of counting her (imaginary) chickens before they were hatched. Improved even before they were estimated to a setting hen.

As I recall the tale (it has been too many years since I read it), this girl was toting a basket of eggs and instead of paying heed to what she was doing, she fell to dreaming of the riches in store, when she would have made a big success of the poultry business.

As she was preening herself in her mind's eye, tossing her head, thinking how grand she would be in her silks and furs, she tripped and fell. And crash went the basket of eggs, leaving her the same as always, only poorer.

The moral of the story seems to be; keep your eye on the ball. Address your interest, energy and attention to the task at hand. If you would rise on the escalator of life, into the realm of better things. - M. H.

Dear Mary Haworth: A number of rather prominent bachelor lawyers and doctors around town drafted this letter and await your reply, as the subject has caused quite an argument. I'm just the typist —the girl in the case.

What is proper? A man and a girl are neighbors in the same apartment building. Their respective room mates are friendly.

Home from work one afternoon, the man decides to mix a drink. His room mate is present. Both are fully attired. The man telephones the girl and says, "We are having a drink; won't you join us?" She says "No." Intentions were honorable.

The dispute is because the girl thinks the man should have asked to fetch her, from her apartment to his. He thinks not. Who is right? — S.S.

Dear S.S.: Men have two standards of deportment: one for the women they love and cherish, another for the women who don't really matter to them.

In this instance, the argumentative man was practising Standard No. 2. He would hope, however, that his sister, his fiancee or his wife would be as correct as the girl who said "no" — due to an ingrained sense of propriety that prohibits her from ever being "one of the boys," figuratively speaking.

NEW DEMOCRATS SPEAK

But first let me make clear what our Party intends to do about Health care. Let me tell you what we have proposed so that you may judge for yourself. First, your relationship with your Doctor. New Democrats propose to make only one change and that is the change as to who is responsible for paying your bill for Health care. You will continue to choose your own doctor. He will still be paid the standard fee for the service he gives you. The only difference will be that instead of the doctor sending his bill to you, he will send it to be paid by a public agency in your province. If he should send it to you, then you can send it to the public agency for payment. The treatment the doctor gives you will be the treatment that he decides is best. Decisions involving medical knowledge will remain entirely under the control of the Medical Profession. As a matter of fact, the chances are that your relationship with your doctor will be even happier than it is now. In Britain a committee composed mainly of Doctors who held important posts in the British Medical Ass'n came to this conclusion, and I quote directly from their Report "the Committee does not think in general that the advent of the National Health Service has disturbed the relationship between Doctors and their patients. In some respects it was found to be better than before. This was attributed to the absence of the money problem and to increased co-operation among Doctors."

This being the case, perhaps you are wondering why the Canadian Medical Ass'n is raising such a fuss over the New Democratic Medical Care Plan in Saskatchewan? And for all Canadians as well? Well, the fairest thing to do is to let them answer for themselves. But up to now their replies have been phrased to frighten rather than to inform the public. You may have heard the charge that Doctors are leaving that country because of the National Health Service. Well, Canadian doctors are leaving Canada. Here are the figures: between 1950-55 and 1960 Britain lost 900 doctors to the United States. An average of one hundred and fifty doctors a year. But between 1955-60 Canada lost 2,130 doctors to the United States, an average of over two hundred a year. Remember that Britain has a population nearly three times the size of Canada. The critics rarely tell us about the number of new doctors being trained in Britain. This is how Prof. Titmus of the London School of Economics describes the situation. He says that since 1948 all the medical schools in Britain have been flooded with applications. Barts Hospital in London was reported to have 2000 applications for 100 places. Well, this doesn't sound like Britain is in dire straights for lack of medical personnel. Rather, it is attracting more men to the medical profession under a Public plan than it can possibly train.

Tomorrow — More about these arguments.
