Then, they contended, the Causeway would be a real necessity to handle "the vastly increased traffic" they envision.

They also urged the province to encourage the development of spuds available last winter in Holland, Italy and Spain, they insist, while island bins and warehouses were full and crying for a market, because the marketing organization was not available to handle the business which was too big for any one shipper to take on alone.

Candidate Leo McLeas, one of the two offering in Queens, a beef cattle breeder and well as a large potato producer and commission agent, says cattle were lost as much as $40 to $50 a head last winter on their sale because proper selling facilities were not available.

His party, he promises, would provide legislation that would encourage the development of marketing boards that would be effective in the handling of potatoes and cattle.

Observers See P.E.I. Battle Of Ballots As Interesting

Political observers across the province are looking for one of the most interesting contests in years when ballots are cast Monday, as the culmination to a contest that has been waged ever since Prime Minister Diefenbaker called the federal election back in mid-April.

Top line Progressive Conservative campaign workers are insisting they'll sweep all four seats here this time, just as they did in 1957 and again the following year.

The top Liberal backers are just as insistent that their party will have its biggest day since the earlier 1957s, with most of them calling for three victories, and the more enthusiastic insisting they'll be satisfied with nothing less than a victory in every island seat.

Each of these factions insist that their parties will win enough seats across the country to get overall majority in the 305-seat House of Commons.

Close Vote Seen

In between the two extremes, though, there is a large section of political opinion that looks for one of the closest elections in years. Those people expect that result in this province and also across the nation, with many of them willing to settle for something close to a stalemate in both places.

The more aggressive political backers for each of the two old parties become embroiled at times in an always inconclusive argument about which set of figures they should use when they assess the odds which Liberal candidates in this province must overcome to win election in any of the three ridings.

The PCs insist that the unprecedented majorities of Fisheries Minister Angus MacLean and Health Minister J. G. Cross of 6,182 and 5,665 respectively in 1958 in the margin Liberal Alton Gillis and Lewis must overcome this time. But the Liberals' top echelon come back with the argument that the total franchise PC vote majority in Queens in the provincial election in 1959 was less than 300, and that, they insist, is closer to the real margin their party must overcome this time.

Those who figure on the hands of former majorities alone, suggest that Kings affords the best chance of a Liberal victory in this time as the 1961 by-election margin there was only slightly more than 180. The federal margin in Prince in 1958 was 2,300.

Speculation concerning the New Democrats would appear to be mostly on how large a slice of the votes they will receive. There are some, but their numbers do not appear large, who consider them likely to win WIDE-RANGING ISSUES.

National issues range over a large number of subjects but the local issue, as stressed in the campaign here narrows down to a few major items.

The PCs are standing on their record. P.E.I. gets $6 million more annually from Ottawa than it did under the Liberals, they claim, including the $3,500,000 share of the Atlantic Ad-

CAUSEWAY STRESSED

The big Causeway project is their punch line and they've been featuring it this week in full-page advertisement tempo that had some of the Liberals here worried Thursday, although the Grills who had been trying to pit it down as a Tory achievement were jubilant after Prime Minister Diefenbaker got his timing married in a reference, at a meeting here in the Sports Arena. The PCs' national leader said first it would provide work for 1100 men for six years, and just before he ended his speech indicated it would be completed by 1967.

The Liberals promise an immediate start on an ice-breaking, train-carrying ferry — the Confederation, they say, does neither — which they insist would carry the island through the job of freight and other winter transport until the proposed Causeway is built.

It would be a companion ship to the 15-year-old Abegweit, and the Liberals have questioned the PC claim that the survey report on the Causeway feasibility was ready when Mr. Diefenbaker made the "We'll build it" announcement a half hour before the election. Hon. Howard Green, these spokesmen insist, had said several weeks earlier the survey report was not available, and that it could not be available until the flow was out of the Northumberland Strait.

The DP's statement farm income dropped 44 percent here last year "is not keeping with the PC boast the farmers never had it so good". The Liberals repeat the Prime Minister's claim that farmers would know in the future before they planted their potatoes, the price they would get for them in the fall, and contrast that promise, they claim, with the present situation when farmers from several areas of Kings and Prince have made a concerted demand for compensation for disabilities that include low yields and poor prices, and are still awaiting a final answer.

DOLLAR CLAIMS

Farm machinery and some livestock feed prices have increased because of the pegged dollar, claim the Liberals although the PCs come back with a counter claim the pegged dollar has helped both fishermen and cattlemen who are shipping products to the United States.

The Liberals have been making the most out of the government's failure to delay the opening of the lobster season, particularly during the period several weeks ago when ice covered a large sector of the province's northern coastline.

The New Democrats link the causeway to an overall scheme of Maritime development. They would develop the total power potential of the Bay of Fundy, tie it in with a large-scale thermal power plant that they say would utilize Nova Scotia's low unmarketable coal, and provide more hydro power than is produced in the whole of Canada now, and at one-half the cost.

They insist, however, would have the way for industrial and economic development that would bring in many a large population, there would be ample markets here at home for everything the area could produce.
