

MARY HAWORTH Ailing Wife Deserves Better

MARY HAWORTH'S MAIL
Dear Mary Haworth: When one's husband has been faithful 35 years, then turns to an affair with another woman, how does one go on living? This is our story, that I would have thought unbelievable a few years ago.
I am 58, and Jake (I'll call him) is 60. We are partners in farming, operating 600 acres, living frugally, with almost no vacations and no modern conveniences until a few years ago. We have six grown children and several grandchildren, all healthy and intelligent.
The other woman is 34 and has young children. She doesn't go to church and professes no religion; but she is a good housekeeper, with a pleasant relaxed disposition.
I realize I have been very much at fault, so busy with housework, gardening, bookkeeping for Jake, etc., etc. that I was often tired and cross. Also, a physical ailment had been growing steadily worse for the last three years, during which time I dreaded coming into my intimacy.
REFUSES DIVORCE
I am in the hospital today, scheduled for surgery tomorrow, morning, that our doctor insisted upon, as did the children. My husband was indifferent to it until recently.
I have told Jake I love him very much—one may lose that person, but I shall never lose that I felt for him—and will not give him up. He says that once he would have died for me, but feels so differently now that he doesn't know if he will ever want me again. He thinks he loves the other woman and wants a divorce, and a property division so he can marry her.
The other woman's husband found out about the same time I did and sued, but we managed to quiet things with a money settlement, and have kept it from our children (except one son) and the public.
Jake has been going to church recently a had almost quit before; and is kinder to me, and takes me some places. But will I ever win him back? Or will he be caged, always longing for her? W.F.

After the ceremony a reception for both families was held at the home of Mr. and Mrs. John Gamble, Parkdale.

MILLEN'S DIARY A Cricket Still Sings

"You'll hardly believe it... not after first snow and the cool weather we've had, but come and hear me in through the moonlight of its evening to summon us out of doors."
"There!" she smiled after we had listened breathless in the yard. It's a cricket singing! It's not the all yet, is it?" she offered.
Autumn is a much prettier word. It was Autumn that today continued to cast a lovely spell over the stubbled fields and the pastures. Warm, remember? Summery. Ideal for lifting the dahlias and "Glads"—leaving them a while to dry in the sunlight before she storing; for gathering up seeds of flowers one must have for next spring; for bachelors and their wives in Biblical return an hundred-fold in beauty of blossom—to have a remember that somewhere a recent bride had chosen their fragile race for her bridal bouquet, and hollyhock we picked too, to last long. And through some other summer, and through some bouquet-sprays of globe thistle with the round mauve seed-pods, he gold of Chinese lanterns, and he delicacy of baby's breath to complete it.
It was an afternoon when the sun and warmth and stillness affairs of our farmwife from London called a join Granddaughter, a little lone and lost with Mack off to manish work at Rob's as she played with the kittens on the lawn.
She covered a cute black one, that on its back eyes closed, "played dead," completely with the gold of fallen leaves. And laughed a little girl's merry laugh and surprised when the inert bundle stirred and a pixyish face and green eyes appeared presently and then a sleek quick body sprang up and away.
"Stay a while!" she begged when at length we too should have been off to our work. "There may never be another day like this before the cold weather sets in," she said. So pleasant it was there in the sunshine—spread day.
"What does the sparrow say?" she smiled pointing out one perched on a golden twig of oak.
"The holidays are slipping—a little girl will soon be back to her school again!"
"But I shan't mind that... Tell me more," she said.
"More?" she said.
"The holidays are slipping—again—with roses in bloom and clovers..."
"And strawberries—time!" she nodded.
"Yes and the days long and lazy, with lingering sunsets and thrushes' songs."
"But I like this time of year too," she said. "I love the colors in the trees. I like to watch the leaves fall, like those of the poplar right now. One would think they were new pennies—only larger of course! And somehow the flowers left seem prettier; the pansies and marigolds and the phlox... and the pumpkins!" she chuckled "for Halloween!"
And here now, well into the moonlight, "home is" our farmer "Home from" Rob's manish field.
Until tomorrow — — — Diary Good-Night...
