man, or he would have respected me, when I told him I could not reciprocate his love, and he would have let us when he discovered that his interference was causing an estrangement between you and me. Until I came here, we lived in peace and harmony."
"It is your own stubbornness, Belle," he replied, "that has caused the trouble. Mr.
Montenohl has invariably manifested the greatest regard for you, and always speaks of you in the most affectionate manner.
Were he my own son, I could not think more of him than I do now."
"Let us drop the subject," she pleaded, "I do not like it, and hereafter let me live in union and love as we did before he came among us."
"My word is pledged, Belle," he answered,
"and I will keep it."
"Unless I can prove him to be an impostor," was the prompt rejoinder.
"Yes, do that, and I will consider my obligation cancelled."
"Thank you, father," she responded quickly. "That assurance has made me happy, and throwing her arms around his neck, she kissed him."
"You cannot do it my child," he said,
"softened by her exhibition of filial love."
"Good-night, good-night," and she tripped lightly out of the room.

CHAPTER III.
THE DETECTION AND ARREST.

It was a great entertainment—a magnificent in the highest degree. The Arlington residence was full to repletion. Kings bowed down with the weight of cars, and glittering drapery—crowns upon their heads proud, and gold and jewels in all the show and pomp of their day, chattering waiting maids, peasants, jockeys, clowns and comic-characters, thronged every apartment, crowded every corridor, and were scattered over the lawn. It was a beautiful evening, warm and pleasant.

Another character worthy of special notice was that of a large muscular man in full Highland dress, one of old Scotland's proud lords. He wore a blood red mask, and a silver bagle hung at his waist.

Montenohl was there, attired in a plain suit of broadcloth, his face slightly contorted by the weariness of his long day's ride, and had selected a costume best adapted to the enjoyment of his favorite pastime. Her short skirt glittered with gold and jewels, and her hair was one mass of brilliant curls. She wore no mask, and was the bright star of the assembly. Belle was happy, and enjoyed the scene to the full. Early in the morning she had had an interview with the cloaked stranger of the evening before, and he had returned to the city, taking the old negro Sam with him. When the Scottish lord was first announced and entered the parlors, had one observed them very closely, a slight look of recognition, and a faint smile, as if he had seen the man who had Highlander could have been detected.

Mr. Arlington delighted in the display of his wealth, and on occasions like this was most lavish of his money to render it truly superb. He walked to and fro through the crowds of happy partisans, and with a polite to all, there was a distant reverberation in his bearing, as if he hardly came down to a level with them.

Montenohl did not incline to be very sociable. He was in fact, unusually reticent, and content to be seen, and to be seen by himself, from any active participation in the festivities. The Scottish lord tried several times to draw him into conversation but failed, and finally Mr. Montenohl, pleading increased illness, returned to his room.

Immediately thereafter, the two Spanish knights, arm in arm left the parlors and passed into the hall, and thence to the stables, until some distance from the house, then sat down in a rustic bower where they were effectually hidden from observation.
Here they remained concealed, though several parties were sent in pursuit of them.

Thus the night wore on, and it was nearly midnight, when the two Spanish knights returned from the stable, and were seen by a number of friends, were startled by the report. While still hesitating, the man in the garb of the Highlander, stepped into the apartment through an open casement from the corridor, his face flushed and his hair falling over his forehead, and with a glance at the clock, he said, "It is a quarter of twelve. Belle, I have a long ride home." Mr. Arlington was dumb with amazement.
Belle, so deadly, was not entirely taken by surprise, yet the sound of fire arms, the commotion and the crash were more than she had expected.

"What does all this mean?" demanded Mr. Arlington, recovered from his fright.
"That you have an assassin in your house," replied the assumed Highlander.
"O, my God! has there been a murder?"
"No, there was only attempt to murder."
"And the offender has been arrested?"
"The offender has been arrested," replied Mr. Arlington, dropping into a chair with a groan, "I have a long ride home, and I have been clapped up for her arrest." At this moment two police officers came from the carriage-house, leading between them the late coachman, M. Hart, now heavily ironed. Almost at the same time, two other officers came down into the parlors, and, with a look of stern determination, said, "You were, I am afraid, somewhat late, was it not, Mr. Arlington?"
"These Mr. Arlington," remarked the Highlander, "are two precious scoundrels, I have travelled over three thousand miles, and visited over a hundred cities to find them."
"Of what are they accused?" asked Mr.
Arlington, "Are there any specific charges against them?"
"Yes, they are guilty of three separate murders, and burglaries without number.
Their last actual deed of violence was in the city of Mexico. There they poisoned an old man named Montano, and robbed him of a sum of gold. A reward of fifty thousand dollars was offered for their apprehension."
"You think these are the guilty parties?"
"I know they are."
"This is awful!" and Mr. Arlington bowed his head on his hands.

"You, indeed, have reason to be thankful that it is as well with you as it is," remarked the detective, as the assumed Highlander in reality was. "Last night, while lying under a rose-bush near your carriage-house, I listened to a plot between these villains
