CHAPTER IX

When a man is held responsible for the mysterious disappearance of a large sum of money and is found murdered, interesting conclusions may be reached. Terry pondered several possible conclusions, weighing each in his mind. He accepted none as definite but retained each as a possibility. Of one thing he felt rather certain—those vouchers were going to play an important part in this case.

There were still nearly three hours before he would follow the lead mentioned over the phone. He hunched his shoulders, his figure straight and stiff, and felt the gun in his coat pocket. He had wasted too much time already before trying to locate Kay. If she was in danger every minute counted.

He slipped into a telephone booth, called the Sun and asked for the city desk. "Deane, this is Terry. Just thought I'd call you up and let you know this case is developing. Yeah, it's getting bigger every hour... Yeah, I know it's plenty big now, but it's just like Little Eva, it just grows... No, there's nothing new I can give you now, it's all prospective... Sure, it's worth following up... I tell you I know I'm on the right track. And no other paper or news service is anywhere near it.

"Yeah, that's right, they're all out of step with me. Let me follow up my hunch... Well, if you don't, I'll do it on my own and sell out to the highest bidder when the yarn pops... Now you're talking. Just leave it to Terry... Say, you haven't had any word of a beautiful, auburn-haired girl being found dead or something, have you?... Not yet, eh?... If she's found dead, it's damned important... I'll tell you when the story's fit to be printed... So long—and prepare yourself for a shock when you see my swindle sheet."

He dropped the receiver back on the hook and sighed in relief. When he left the booth he bent his knees, instead of hunching his shoulders as he usually did. He pulled the front brim of his hat down, stuffed the handkerchief in his coat lapel pocket down out of sight, and returned to his car. He drove to a district on North State Street where the subjects of the photographs which filled the Rogues Gallery were apt to be.

Pulling up in an alley behind what appeared to be an abandoned wall of brick, but which was really the back of a night club, he left his car and walked around front. He slipped into the corner tavern that bore the inscription "Barney's" in faded blue letters on a faded green background and had windows obstructed by cases of dummy bottles and beer cans.

The room was dark, light being furnished by a single, well-shaded ceiling lamp. It was large, but numerous tables, surrounded by sturdy chairs, occupied all the floor space except a narrow aisle along the bar. The bar itself was common enough, but the man who stood behind it was not. He was short, with a bulbous face and an even more bulbous figure that forced the dirty apron into exaggerated contours. It was the face, however, that set him off from his fellow men, for its most noticeable feature was a long gash that looked like a streak of white tape from the tip of his right temple down his cheek and across his chin.

Terry sat on a stool near the bar, wondering what the regular customers in this place found appealing.

"Beer," he said being careful not to look at the bartender. He glanced around, noticing that about half of the tables were occupied. When the beer was set before him he picked it up and carried it to one of the tables, where two men sat in sullen silence.

"Mind if I sit down?" he inquired casually. One of the men stared at him through heavy-lidded eyes that rested for a moment on the bandage under the hat brim. He shrugged and said, "Sure, go ahead. I've been closer to worse guys 'n you."

Terry pulled up a chair, set the stein of beer on the table and slouched down in imitation of his companions. He sipped the beer tentatively, hid a grimace of disgust and wiped as much of the stuff from his lips as he could.

"Say," he said, as if suddenly remembering something, "have you boys seen Sick Salomon lately? Where's he been?"

The two looked at each other, then one said, "No. Not for three, four months. Why?"

ON FRAUD CHARGE

MONTREAL, Sept. 26 — (CP) — T. Douglas Sinclair was charged today in Criminal Court here with having defrauded his employers, Raymond Rose Inc., stock brokers of $8,421 by fictitious buying of stock shares in the name of unauthorized persons. Sinclair allegedly purchased shares from his firm without the knowledge of clients and converted the returns from these transactions to his own use.

Lowther-Gamble Wedding

A quiet but pretty wedding was solemnized on Wednesday afternoon, August 22, at the Central Christian Church Parsonage, when Gladys Lolita, only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Llewellyn Gamble, Charlottetown was united in the Holy Bonds of Matrimony with Norman Cameron, son of Mr. and Mrs. Eric Lowther, Crapaud.

The double-ring ceremony was performed by the Rev. Marvel D. Dunbar. The parents of the bride and groom attended the ceremony.

The bride was attired in a pale blue lace over taffeta dress with a corsage of red roses and sweet peas. Navy blue accessories made her costume complete. The bridesmaid, Miss Bertha Baglole, wore a pink lace over taffeta dress with navy blue accessories and a corsage of white carnations and sweet peas.

Attending the groom as best man was Mr. Sheldon Ferguson.

For her daughter's wedding, the bride's mother chose a navy blue crepe dress with white accessories and a corsage of gladioli.

The groom's mother wore an aqua printed silk dress with grey accessories and a corsage of gladioli. After the ceremony a wedding supper was held for the immediate families at the White Gables Tourist Home. A three-tier wedding cake, topped by a miniature bride and groom, amid a setting of sweet peas, centered the bride's table, and was cut in the traditional manner.

The young couple left amid showers of confetti and good wishes on a honeymoon trip by car to Maritime points of interest. For travelling the bride wore a wine gabardine suit with matching accessories.

Previous to their marriage, a shower was given for the bride and groom at Crapaud where they received many lovely gifts of silver, linen, crystal, china, and money.

Upon their return, a buffet supper was held at the home of the groom where some seventy guests were served.

Previous to her marriage the bride was on the staff of the Union Commercial College, Charlottetown.

Mr. and Mrs. Lowther will reside in Crapaud where the groom is a prosperous young farmer.

CANOE COVE Y. P. S.

The regular meeting of the Canoe Cove Young People's Society met at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Rodolph MacDonald on Tuesday evening, Sept. 24th. Meeting opened in the usual manner by singing Doxology and repeating the "Lord's Prayer" in unison. Hymn 494 was then sung.

Minutes were read by secretary. Roll call was answered by each member repeating a verse of scripture. Correspondence was read and placed on file. Scripture reading was taken from Romans chapter 12.

Miss Sadie MacFadyen read the lesson, using the theme "The Christian Chooses His Vocation". Devotional period closed by singing Hymn 212 and repeating the Benediction. The remainder of the evening was spent in playing games.

Lunch was served by the host-
