LITTLE BILLY HAS A LESSON

In every day are lessons taught,
Each one with needed knowledge fraught.
—Old Motheir Nature.

The little people of the Green Forest and the Green Meadows, the Old Pasture, and the Smiling Pool, Laughing Brook and the Old Orchard, have a great deal to learn in a very short time. Boys and girls have all the years of growing up in which to learn how to live when they are fully grown. The little folk in feathers and fur grow up so fast, in so short a time, that they must learn equally fast and they can't afford to forget. Boys and girls forget over and over again with no real harm coming to them, but furred and feathered folks seldom can forget even once and live.

From the time little folks begin to run or fly about they are always at school. It is the school of life. They learn by seeing and hearing and feeling. And those who live longest are those who learn fastest and remember best.

Little Billy Possum, out in the Great World all alone, had already learned that on the ground he was likely to meet enemies. All the frights he had had so far had happened on the ground. Although he had spent much time in trees he never once had had a bad fright there. That was one reason he had chosen a hole high up in an old dead tree in which to sleep. It hadn't entered his small head that some enemy he might meet on the ground might be able to climb as readily as he could, or even better. So up in his new home in what had once been Drummer the Woodpecker's home, he not only felt very comfortable, but also very safe. While he was up in that tree, or in any tree, he felt no need of watching for possible enemies. He sometimes sat in his doorway, his head outside watching what was going on about him. He was doing this one day when Chatterer the Red Squirrel appeared in a neighboring tree.

It was the first time he had ever seen Chatterer. Now as you know, Chatterer the Red Squirrel is more at home in a tree than he is on the ground. Little Billy just didn't know what to make of it as Chatter ran up and down the trunk of the tree, ran out on the limbs, and jumped from one to another. He himself could climb, but he was a slow climber and he certainly couldn't jump like that fellow in the red coat. He wasn't afraid of Chatterer because he didn't seem big enough to be afraid of. He had yet to learn that danger is not always to be judged by size.

Then right while he was watching an astonishing thing happened. That is, it was astonishing to the little Possum because he had never seen anything of the kind before. A swift moving form shot past him, so fast that he didn't see what it was. It shot straight past Chatterer. If Chatterer had moved fast before it was nothing to the way he moved now.

He dodged around the trunk of the tree like a little red flash. There was a scream of disappointment and anger. Then Sharpshin the Hawk checked himself before hitting that tree, turned and flew up to the top of the dead tree in which Little Billy had his home. Little Billy dodged back out of sight. This was something new. He had seen feathered folks before of course. Most of them had been small. He hadn't dreamed that any of them could be dangerous. But unless his eyes had fooled him, and he knew they hadn't, that feathered person had tried to catch that lively red-coated stranger in the neighboring tree who now was scolding as fast as his tongue could go. You know Chatterer the Red Squirrel is one of the greatest scolders in all the Green Forest.

Could it be that there was danger up off the ground as well as on it? Must he watch for enemies in the air as well as on the ground? "Ah reckon Ah better," said Little Billy to himself after a long time.

He had another lesson without knowing it was a lesson. Never again would he feel safe just because he was out of reach of an enemy on the ground. Also he had learned that there could be danger from the air. He would never forget what he had learned and for that he would live longer.

Contract Bridge

By Josephine Culbertson

RUBBER BRIDGE VS. DUPLICATE

Most players who have had experience at both rubber bridge and duplicate know that different bidding techniques are called for. Only a few players, however, realize that the play is also subject to variations. Consider this deal from the two points of view.

South dealer.
Both sides vulnerable.

	♠ J 7 5 ♥ 5 4 3 2 ♦ 10 8 ♣ A Q J 4
♠ Q 10 6 3 ♥ J 10 9 ♦ K 9 5 4 ♣ 6 2	N W E S	♠ 4 ♥ K 8 7 6 ♦ A J 7 3 ♣ 9 8 3
	♠ A K 9 8 2 ♥ A Q ♦ Q 6 ♣ K 10 7 5

At either rubber bridge or match points, South should reach a four-spade contract with some such bidding as this:

South	West	North	East
1 ♠	Pass	2 ♠	Pass
4 ♠	Pass	Pass	Pass

Let's assume that West opens the heart jack from the top of his three-card sequence—certainly, the normal selection. It doesn't matter whether or not East plays the king; in any case, South wins and starts to take out trumps.

How should South go about this trump-drawing? The answer depends entirely on whether South is playing rubber bridge or match-point duplicate! At rubber bridge, he sees that he need lose only two diamonds tricks, and therefore can well afford the loss of a trump trick. Thus, his proper play is to cash no more than one high trump, then to lead a low trump toward dummy's jack. If either defender has four trumps to the queen-ten, this safety play returns high dividends, because it will hold that defender to one trick in the suit. Contrariwise, if declarer lays down the ace-king of trumps and gets the mentioned break, he will lose two trump tricks and his contract.

At match-points, however, the fact that a 3-2 break of the five missing trumps is probable, strongly depreciates the value of the safety play, because now, the chance that South may drop the spade queen in two leads becomes of considerable importance. By using the safety play, South might get a bad match-point score even though he was insuring the contract, and therefore many experts would deliberately give up safety and, in this case, lose the contract!
