BURGESS BEDTIME STORIES

(By Thornton W. Burgess)

TIRED, HUNGRY AND DISAPPOINTED

Judgment that is good for ought from experience is wrought. —Honker the Goose

That is true. That is why so often judgment is so wholly wrong. It has been formed without experience. It seldom is good judgment, seldom right.

All the long day Honker had led his flock through the skyways. They had taken wing very early in the morning, before the Black Shadows of the night had even begun to go into hiding for the day. They had flown steadily, not stopping once. Now it was late in the afternoon. Jolly, round, red Mr. Sun would soon be going to bed behind the Purple Hills. Far ahead of them they could see the silver gleam of water. They were tired. They were hungry. They were disappointed. They were tired. They were hungry. They were disappointed. They were tired. They were hungry. They were disappointed.

TWO ERRORS IN PLAY

Of the two errors made in today's deal, East's was the less forgivable and, incidentally, was the fatal one!

North dealer
North-South vulnerable.

"Honk! Honk! K honk!" That came from the far end of the pond. Almost at once they saw a Goose flying to meet them, honking a greeting as he flew. They saw a flock on the water near the shore. There were many of the great birds and these now began calling, inviting the weary travelers to join them, telling them there was plenty of food for all. Tired wings seemed to be less tired, less heavy. In a few minutes they would be at rest.

All the flock but their wary old leader filled the air with excited gabbling. The lone flyer coming to meet them circled just ahead of them and turned back to lead the way, all the time honking encouragement and a welcome. The weary flyers were so excited over the pleasant prospect ahead, and so used to following their leader, that at first they did not notice that he was no longer following that lone one who had come out to greet them and lead them

East's two-club overall was certainly stretching things a bit, notwithstanding the vulnerability situation, but this was not the error previously referred to—as a matter of fact, East's rashness should have "paid off" in this case. West opened his top club, and when dummy ducked, East put in the jack. It would have been an excellent idea for declarer to concede the trick; had he done so, East's hand would have been completely isolated. At his leisure, declarer could have established both hearts and spades while keeping East out of the play.

South, however, carelessly took the first trick with the club ace (no doubt because he had a second stopper) and promptly knocked out the ace of hearts. Now, when West led the club seven, East was guilty of a bridge crime; he took the trick with the king! By so doing, he isolated himself as effectively as South could have done, and once more South had plenty of time to establish his tricks without worrying about the club suit. It is a strange fact that the worse a player bids in a certain deal, the more ineffectual his own defense is apt to be in that deal, as though his guilt complex were in full working order! Perhaps East—with a good reason—was upbraiding himself for having made such a weak overall, and perhaps he was afraid that if he did not grab the second club lead, he would never take a trick! Be that as it may, however, East certainly should have ducked the second club on the bare chance of maintaining club communication with his partner.
