

RICHARD WILLISIt's Great For Hockey

Having the Jesse Winchester concert in the rink was not only quite an injustice to some excellent performers, but also to the people who paid $2.25 for the concert. The rink may be great for hockey games, but for musical concerts, the facilities are atrocious. During the concert, it was colder inside the rink than it was outside. The acoustics in the rink are terrible, not to mention the fact that some of the machines in the rink kept vibrating throughout the performance. The distractions and physical discomfort in the rink were not only noticed by the audience, but also by the performers, who made mention of it.

One has to admit though, that if the university plans to have more concerts on campus, they are slightly limited as to the amount of places where it can be held. Hopefully the rink will be covered in ice soon, so that the possibility of ever using that nonstrosity for a concert again will not arise. The Barn and Duffy are both better than the rink (though nowhere near perfect) but both are also very small and in the event of a large concert, they would be of no use. The only place left on campus where a concert can be held is the gym. The gym, like the other places mentioned, has much to be desired, but if the university made a point of holding all concerts in there, there are a few things they could do with the gym to make it quite a bit better for concerts. One would be not to put groups up on the stage which has been the policy in the past. The group should be on a slightly elevated platform in front of the stage. It would make it easier to see them, and also reduce the sound lose into the stage area. Another idea would be to lower the ceiling a bit with some nylon like material (such as some old parachutes) instead of burlap such as is used in the rink

Finally, if the University wouldn't insist on bringing in chairs, more people could attend the concerts, if everybody sat on the floor.

It's Part of UPEI

The U.P.E.I. music dept. as a part of their program presents a one hour music recital every Friday, between eleven thirty and twelve thirty (tentatively) The object of the recitals is to give the students in the music department more opportunity to play in front of an audience. The selection of things to be performed is decided upon by the students. It is usually something that somebody has been doing in conjunction with their classes. As a result, most of the music tends to be classical music, this is an excellent introduction to it because most of the students give a short talk about the composer and the music which they are going to play.

The only problem with the recitals is that they are held in the music department, which is still located down at Holland College. There has been some talk about moving the department up to the campus but nothing definite yet. It will probably be the same as with Home Economics the students won't be told anything till the last minute.

An idea still in the planning stage is that the music department might get the convent building when they move on to campus. If all goes well, they will have a small theatre built in the building. This would be used for the Friday music recitals, but more important, it would eliminate the problem of having to rent the Confederation Centre every time they do a performance. Whether these plans will go through or not is still not known.
